No fear or intimidation was to be seen in their manner, and more than one of the most intelligent of them swore that in their opinion no republican would be maltreated for giving testimony. Apart from the fact that republicans did testify is the further consideration, conclusive upon this point that if there was a disposition on the part of any one to do harm to such witnesses, it would not be done, at such a time, when the act would be evidence tending to sustain the charges as to intimidation, &c.

Mr. Speaker, it will be impracticable, in the time that I may now reasonably occupy, to review the testimony as to all of the so-called bull-dozed parishes. The subcommittee of which I was the chairman was assigned for investigation the parishes of West Baton Rouge, East Baton Rouge, West Feliciana, and East Feliciana—the last three being classed by our republican friends as among the worst of the bull-dozed parishes. So far as I may particularize, I will for the most part confine myself to these parishes, for if the republican party has not been able to make good its charge of intimidation, &c., as to these, no one will have the hardihood to say that their case has been made out in the State at large.

I will consume no time upon the parish of West Baton Rouge, inasmuch as the returning board made no alteration in the vote there cast. This parish having given a republican majority, the returning board were easily convinced that the election was fair. The other three parishes gave democratic majorities as follows: East Baton Rouge, 612; West Feliciana, 471; East Feliciana, 1,736; making a total of 2,819. By the action of the returning board this majority of 2,819 is destroyed and the aggregate republican majority in the same parishes declared to be 1,057. That this result was obtained by the most wanton and flagrant disregard of law and violation of solemn official duty I now propose to demonstrate.

Each parish is, by law, divided into what are called justice of the peace wards, answering to our civil townships in most of the western States.

EAST BATON ROUGE.

The parish of East Baton Rouge has twelve wards. Wards 1 and 2 embrace the city of Baton Rouge, and each one of these wards had two polling-places, which are known on the consolidated return of the supervisor of registration as polls 1 and 2. In ward 2, that a repetition of the same numbers may be avoided, the polls are numbered 3 and 4. There was one polling-place in each of the other ten wards, and because of there being four polling-places in wards 1 and 2, the poll in ward 3 is poll No. 5, in ward 4 No. 6, in ward 5 No. 7, in ward 6 No. 8, in ward 7 No. 9, &c.

The Louisiana election law contains the following provisions.

I will first read from section 2:

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall, at such meeting, open in the presence of said returning officers the statements of the commissioners of election, and the returning officers shall, from such statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, &c.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the results of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns; Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish; if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act; and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of said commissioners in person within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls.

It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

Under the election law of Louisiana persons are permitted to vote at any polling-place in the parish.

F. A. Clover, the supervisor of registration for this parish, disregarded and discarded the votes cast at polls 1, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 13, the six last named representing, as will be remembered, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 11, poll 1 being the court-house poll in the city of Baton Rouge. The polls omitted by the supervisor cast 150 votes for Hayes and 1,136 for Tilden. Upon the vote as cast at all the polls, the majority for Tilden is 612. Without counting the polls ignored by the supervisor, the majority for Hayes is 374, and by omitting also polls 12 and 14, thrown out by the returning board, the majority for Hayes will be 636.

Whether the result thus obtained and declared is fair and to be respected must depend upon what the powers of the returning board and supervisor of registration are, and whether upon the law and facts those powers were exercised lawfully and without fraud.

The following table gives the votes actually cast at the fourteen different polls for electors:

It will be seen by the quotation from section 2, also from the provisions of sections 3 and 43, that the returning officers are required to canvass the vote from the statements of the commissioners of election. These statements are the "lists" and papers which by section 43 the commissioners of election are required to make immediately upon the close of the polls.

The supervisor of registration has no power to consider or pass upon the regularity or sufficiency of the papers used or made out by the commissioners of election. He is a ministerial officer and can exercise no powers except such as are conferred by statute.

It is his duty within twenty-four hours after he receives from the commissioners all the returns of the different polls to prepare his consolidated return, and with it forward to the returning officers all "the originals received by him" from the commissioners.

What statement or papers other than the originals already named is the supervisor authorized or required by law to forward with his consolidated return to the returning board?

If "during the time of registration or revision of registration" there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation or disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place in the parish, at or near the places of registration or revision of registration, preventing or tending to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, it is by section 26 made the duty of the supervisor of registration to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

One of these duplicates he must forward to the returning officers (returning board) with his consolidated return. The other duplicate he must file with the clerk of the district court of that parish for the use of the district attorney.

If "on the day of the election" there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, or disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at or near any poll or voting-place, preventing or tending to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote, it is made the duty of the commissioners of election (or one of them) at such poll, by section 26, to make in duplicate, and under oath, a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. One of these duplicates they must give to the supervisor of registration and by him sent with his consolidated return to the returning board. The other duplicate must be delivered to the clerk of the district court for the use of the district attorney.

The supervisor of registration has no statement or report to make to the returning board upon the subject of riots, tumults, intimidation, &c., unless these occurred during registration or revision of registration, and prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote. The law fixes the period for registration and revision of registration from the 28th day of August to the 28th day of October, inclusive. Nor is he empowered to make any report of his own as to intimidation, &c., occurring on the day of the election. If commissioners of election shall have filed such statement with him, he must forward the same to the returning officers with his consolidated return.

That this is the plain and obvious meaning and only construction to be given to section 26 and the concluding sentence of section 43, cannot be doubted. The statement which the supervisor of registration is expected to make as to intimidation, &c., is limited to the period of which he would have the most definite knowledge. The same is true as to the commissioners of election.

Thus the returning officers would have before them, with the consolidated return and statements of votes cast as made out by the commissioners of election, the complaints so to speak, of supervisors of registration and commissioners of election as to matters about which they respectively would be best informed, in each case sworn to and corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens qualified electors of the parish.

The returning officers have no powers except such as are conferred by statute, and can make no inquiry or finding except to canvass and compile returns from the statements of votes cast as made out by the commissioners of election. They entertain no question and take no action as to intimidation, &c., unless a foundation has been laid therefor, as already stated.

In the report made to the House of Representatives at the second session of the Forty-third Congress by Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE, all republicans, after quoting sections 3 and 26 it is said:

> Upon this statute we are clearly of the opinion that the returning board had no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by the local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificates of the supervisor or commissioners as provided in the third section.

And by way of commentary upon the action of the board they say:

> There is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs.

On the consolidated statement of votes made out and filed by the supervisor, are certain remarks not upon the subject of intimidation, riots, &c., but giving his reasons for not returning in his consolidated returns the votes cast at polls 1, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 13. He says the statements of votes, written records, tally-sheets, &c., brought to him from those polls are illegal, informal, &c. His views upon the subject of whether these polls should be counted were unnecessary, inasmuch as the law did not attach enough importance to his opinions to call for their expression. He has no power to decide whether the statements of votes cast and filed with him by the commissioners of election are irregular, informal, or defective in substance. It is not for him to say that an omission on the part of the commissioners to do some act in the precise manner pointed out by the law renders the election void. It is not expected or assumed by the law that he will give construction to the law and be able to decide whether a given requirement is merely directory or absolutely essential to the validity of the election. He was only a ministerial officer, and yet that he regarded his action final as to the polls he discarded is to be inferred from the fact that he did not furnish the returning board with the statements of votes, tally-sheets, &c., relating to those polls, although he admits they were brought to him and were in his possession.

The returning board should have had these papers before them and they should have decided whether the votes cast at those polls should be thrown out without regard to how much or how little the supervisor may have known on the subject. No one can for a moment doubt this who will carefully read sections 2, 3, and 43. The papers used and made out by the commissioners of the election as to votes cast, &c., at the polls rejected by the supervisor were not returned to the board. These papers should have been examined by the board without regard to the supervisor's opinion or action.

While this point was being considered by the board an effort was made repeatedly by authorized representatives of the democratic party to have those papers produced and examined. The board flatly refused to do this, declaring that they would not go behind the report made to them by the supervisor, that they intended to be governed entirely by his return as to those polls, and that all reports from the commissioners of election must come to them through the supervisor.

I quote the language of President Wells, as follows:

> I differ with the gentleman. The commissioners of election send their report to the supervisor. He is the medium between the commissioners and the board of canvasser, (returning board,) and all statements coming from the supervisor of registration, as I have said before, is prima facie evidence of the result of the election.

Hence we cannot go behind that report. We cannot ignore what he stated to us. We must take that as the evidence and guide for our decision.

Here they declare that they cannot exercise any other or greater power than ministerial election officers, although they then claimed and still claim to possess judicial powers.

Again, when this subject was renewed as to the same polls, the board ruled as follows:

The board has decided to be governed entirely by the returns of the supervisor of registration, and that all reports from the commissioners of election must come to this board from the supervisor.

It would follow, therefore, that no matter how regular were the returns made by the commissioners to the supervisor, if he withheld the returns from the board the latter would not go behind this wanton neglect of duty. If the state of the vote or count was obscure because of any irregularity in the statement of votes cast, tally-sheets, &c., they should have examined the ballots themselves.

The ballots are higher evidence of the number of votes cast and the persons voted for than the certified or even sworn lists and statements made out by the election officers. (See State vs. The Judge, &c., 13 Ala., 805; 28 Cal., 123; 1 Mich., 362; 16 Ohio, 184.)

One receiving a majority of the qualified voters is entitled to the office, no matter what is certified to. (17 Ark., 407.)

It is not pretended that the ballots had not been preserved in the manner required by the law, and therefore the legal presumption of their identity and correctness had not been impaired.

Finally, after the strongest pressure the board permitted two out of seven of the ballot-boxes representing the seven polls rejected by the supervisor to be opened and contents inspected; General Anderson, one of the board, participating in the examination. The boxes opened were those belonging to polls 6 and 8. They are called in the Sherman report boxes 4 and 6, because they were the boxes used in those wards. Before speaking of the contents of these two boxes, I wish to say that under the old law it was the practice to make the returns to the sheriff, who would lock them up for safe-keeping in the box and afterward take them out for compilation. From force of habit, imperfect knowledge of the present law or design, the papers required to be used and made out by the commissioners at the close of the election were by them put into the boxes and locked up.

Box 8, that is, the box used in ward 6, when opened was found by General Anderson to contain the tally-sheets, statement of votes, and poll-list. The vote was found to be 12 for Hayes and 64 for Tilden. It is not pretended that there was found the slightest irregularity in the papers relating to this poll. And yet it was not counted by the board.

Box 6, that is, the box used in ward 4, was opened by General Anderson, and the only imperfection found was that the statement of votes cast was not signed by the commissioners. The tally-sheets were signed, and it appeared therefrom that Tilden received 373 votes and Hayes 7. The statement of votes was the least important paper, for without it the accuracy of the tally-sheets could be tested by the ballots themselves. These are two of the polls rejected by the supervisor, and the board also refused to count them.

Whether their conduct would have been the same if the votes at these polls had been reversed can only be determined in the light of their conduct throughout.

It will be seen that it was of the utmost importance to examine the papers and ballots of all the seven polls ignored by the supervisor in order that it might be known by the board what appeared therefrom.

The law is well settled that very little attention should ordinarily be paid to mere irregularities in the proceedings of election officers, which do not affect the merits of the case. (2 Parsons, 503; Brightly's Election Cases, 268.)

Those provisions which affect the time and place of the election and the legal qualifications of the electors are generally of the substance of the election, while those touching the recording and return of the legal votes received and the mode and manner of conducting the mere details of the election are directory. (19 Barb., 540.)

The very able and distinguished lawyer and member from Iowa, Mr. McCRARY in his valuable and now standard work on the American Law of Elections says:

The officers of election may be liable to punishment for a violation of the directory provisions of a statute, yet the people are not to suffer on account of the default of their agents.

Upon this point see 20 Ill., 72; 2 Green, (N. J.,) 68; 1 Oregon, 123; 20 Minn., 107; 11 Mich., 362; 26 Texas, 5; 1 Kansas, 279; 2 Cal., 135; 34 Cal., 635; Brightly's Election Cases, 448, 449, 450.

The failure of officers of election to be sworn will not affect the election if it did not affect the result. (10 Mich., 107; 12 Cal., 352; 26 Cal., 161.)

In this connection it may be well to refer to the well-settled doctrine that the acts of officers of election, within the scope of their authority, are presumed to be correct.

The supervisor's consolidated return purports to have been made out and sworn to at Baton Rouge before the clerk of the district court on the 11th of November. He swears that he went to New Orleans with his return on the 11th or 12th of November and that he did not file the same with the clerk of the returning board until ten or twelve days thereafter. After arriving at New Orleans on the 18th of November he swore to what is termed in the Sherman report his protest. The law requires that his protest or statement upon the subject of intimidation, &c., shall be "annexed to his consolidated return by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance," and that his return shall be forwarded by mail within twenty-four hours after he has received returns from the several polls. The law further provides that his return (consolidated) and the statements of votes cast, &c., prepared and used by the commissioners of election are by him "to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth securely sealed." He did not forward his return by mail but took it to New Orleans in person and did not file it for ten or twelve days thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that the law is only directory as to the time within which and manner in which these papers shall be transmitted, but as bearing upon the question of willful misconduct and fraud on the part of the supervisor and returning board, their failure to conform to the plainest provisions of the law should not be lost sight of. Nothing can be more clear than that to give the returning board jurisdiction of subject-matter which may be lawfully put in the supervisor's protest, that protest must be inclosed with the consolidated return when the supervisor parts with the latter, for after he has filed his return with the board, he, as a ministerial officer, has no further control over it.

The fact that the consolidated return and protest were made out and sworn to at different times—seven days apart—and sworn to at places over one hundred miles apart, together with the fact that the supervisor swears he cannot remember whether the protest was with the return when he filed the latter with the clerk of the returning board, is certainly sufficient to rebut any presumption that he complied with the law in this regard.

The supervisor in his protest gives the names of three persons said to be maltreated—the first, William Payne, colored, killed shortly "before or during" registration. He does not say that it was because Payne was a republican or that politics had anything to do with it. The second person named is Isadore Heron, colored, who he says was dragged with a rope by the neck until he was nearly dead; says Heron was a republican, but does not aver that the act was committed because he was a republican. Heron filed an affidavit before the returning board and did not charge that his politics was in any manner involved. He says it occurred in February, 1876, which was long before registration began and at a time when there was no political excitement in the parish.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is at that time lynching of persons guilty of stealing hogs, cattle, and cotton in the seed was of very frequent occurrence—often very summary and very severe.

The third and last person named is one Alexander Gilbert, said by the supervisor to be a prominent colored republican. Those seeking to do Gilbert some bodily harm, not finding him at home, are said to have put a rope around Mrs. Gilbert's neck with the threat that if she did not disclose where her husband was she should be hung. This is the statement of the supervisor. He does not enlighten us as to the cause of this unlawful conduct, nor how it affected, if at all, the matter of Mr. Gilbert's registration.

Mr. Speaker, it is of some significance that the wrong doers were in this instance, as in the one last named, armed with a rope, the article in most frequent use even in the Northern and Western States where vigilance committees undertake to administer the law.

All else in the protest is general without reference to particular persons or places. He does not name a single instance of failure to register. Nor does he say even in general terms that any act of which he complains prevented or tended to prevent a free and full registration. The fact is the list of colored registered voters was 673 larger than ever before. And among all the affidavits and answers to interrogatories filed before the returning board not one can be found where the affiant or any other person in his behalf swears that he failed to register.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if there was political intimidation of the colored voters, and that those of this class who voted the democratic ticket did it through fear, it would have been the most natural subterfuge and stratagem on their part to neglect registration so that they would not be entitled to vote.

It will be found upon examination of the affidavits, and answers to interrogatories filed by the republicans before the returning board, that the charges of intimidation are of the most sweeping character, so much so as to compel you to believe, if you give full credit to them, that the colored vote of the entire parish was demoralized and terrorized to the last degree. If this was true why did the board count any of the votes?

No instance of discharge from employment or threat of discharge is named in the supervisor's protest, nor by the commissioners. This will doubtless be looked upon as a little remarkable in sections of the Union farther north where this kind of moral suasion is not unknown in the work of heated political campaigns.

The absence of specific allegations in the supervisor's protest as to the period of registration and revision of registration, and in the complaints made by the commissioners of what occurred on the day of election, is a matter of great surprise, if facts were so abundant, when it is considered that those papers were all drawn at New Orleans as much as ten days after the election.

Whoever will take the trouble to read the proceedings before the returning board will observe that the testimony for the most part is the wildest hearsay.

Mr. Speaker, what is the well-settled rule as to hearsay evidence where intimidation is charged? The rule as laid down in the Forty-second Congress in the contested-election case of Norris vs. Handley is as follows:

When it is alleged that a large number of persons have been deterred from voting by violence and intimidation, the testimony of those persons or some of them, should be produced. The opinions and impressions of others is not sufficient.

This was the rule adopted by the Committee of Elections, a majority of whom were republicans, and applied to a contested-election case from a southern State. If it was in that case a sound and salutary rule, should it be in any manner relaxed by the returning board; a body which claims not only to possess and exercise quasi-judicial powers, but which is also understood to maintain that its findings are not subject to examination and review even by the Senate and House of Representatives?

Is it not the very rule that should obtain with the returning board, when it is remembered that their examination and compilation of the vote takes place very soon after the election, before partisan passion has had time to cool, and while each party is charging upon the other every species of misrepresentation and fraud? Was it not the exact rule that should have been strictly and severely applied in order, if possible, to give character and confidence to the finding of the board when made, a tribunal which, from its past official conduct, was distrusted, if not despised, by every honest man of whatever political party, North and South?

Mr. Speaker, what a golden opportunity was thus thrown away? A straightforward and manly discharge of duty would almost, if not quite, have healed over and erased the brand heretofore fixed upon that body by the following words, which I quote from the report made to the Forty-third Congress by the special committee of which Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR was chairman, to wit:

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

The supervisor in his protest says that during the registration large numbers of colored voters were induced by fraud and false representation to deposit their registration papers for safe-keeping with white democrats; that this was done for the purpose of depriving colored men of their votes and also for the purpose of causing said papers to be illegally used and fraudulently voted upon by parties other than the rightful voters. He does not name a case of the kind, nor was there any proof or attempt at proof of this allegation before the returning board. And in all the testimony since taken before any and all committees I have not heard of any such occurrence. He says, too, that republican meetings were interfered with. There was some evidence before the board to this effect, but when the rebutting evidence taken, presented to the returning board by the democratic managers and by the subcommittee of which I was a member is examined, it will be admitted that the preponderance is overwhelmingly against the statements made before the board. He does not say that these meetings were disturbed during registration or revision of registration, nor does he tell of any one who failed to register on that account. He says that during the registration he was requested by colored men not to establish a poll at Port Hudson, for the reason that they would not be permitted to vote the republican ticket there. He did establish a poll there, however, and George Jackson, John Smith, Frank Jackson, and George Ooustner swear they voted the republican ticket of their own free will at Port Hudson, without molestation, and that to the best of their knowledge everything was conducted peaceably and fair. This testimony was before the board, having been taken by the managers on the democratic side. Everything contained in the protest, however, not pertinent to the period and fact of registration and revision of registration was mere surplusage, could give the board as a ground of action no jurisdiction whatever, and although sworn to sustains no other or different relation to the case than the sworn statement of any other person.

As already shown, the returning board has no power or jurisdiction to reject polls on account of intimidation, riots, &c., occurring on the day of the election, unless the commissioners of election at such poll or polls have, as provided in section 26, made under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens qualified electors of the parish. This statement the law requires to be prepared in duplicate, one copy to be filed by them with the supervisor of registration and by him to be forwarded with his consolidated return to the returning board, and the other to be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court.

Mr. Speaker, in the volume known as Sherman's report will be found statements purporting to be by commissioners of election, as to intimidation and other corrupt influences alleged to have existed on the day of the election. It cannot be ascertained from this volume, nor from the one certified to be a full report of the proceedings before the returning board by T. W. Collins, stenographer, what use, if any, was made of these statements by the board.

There is a complaint or statement as to poll 2 in ward 2, which is poll 4 as known and numbered on the supervisor's consolidated return. Also, as to polls 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, and 14, as numbered on the supervisor's return, as heretofore explained. All of these statements purport to be corroborated by three witnesses, except those relating to poll 6, ward 4, poll 9, ward 7, and poll 11, ward 9. In all respects all of said statements are insufficient in substance and in form, and conferred no jurisdiction on the board to inquire into any of the matters which by law could be lawfully stated therein.

POLL 4.

B. V. Baranco is the republican commissioner who makes complaint, as aforesaid, to poll 4. He swears there was general intimidation at that poll, &c. Notwithstanding Mr. Baranco's formidable statement the board did not throw out. It gave Hayes a majority of 233. Lieutenant Gerlach, Third United States Infantry, stationed at Baton Rouge, testified that this man Baranco called him aside and said, "We fixed them; we got them tally-sheets and papers locked up in the boxes where they've got big democratic majorities, and they can't count them now."

Can it be that the failure to throw out poll 4 was in any degree due to the fact that Hayes had a majority there?

Was poll 10, in ward 8, retained for any such reason? There Hayes had a majority 271. They threw out poll 6, where Hayes received 7 votes and Tilden 373, although the commissioner's statement was not corroborated by three witnesses. The same is true of poll 9, where Hayes got 8 votes and Tilden 177. They retained poll 11. Whether that was because the complaint of the commissioner was not corroborated by three witnesses, or because at that poll Hayes had a majority of 81, the board alone can with certainty know.

Leroy Price, colored, made affidavit before the board that he went to poll 1, in the city of Baton Rouge, early in the morning, and waited until three o'clock p. m. without being able to vote, the democrats having possession of the poll and keeping all republicans from voting. This story is a little too much for average human credulity, for there were only 28 votes cast at that poll, and Hayes got twenty-two out of twenty-eight.

POLL 5.

Joseph Williams, republican, is the commissioner who makes complaint as to poll 5 in ward 3. First, he says that while on his way to the poll that morning he met two men on horseback who said, "Come on; we are waiting for you;" says the two men then turned back and fired off their pistols; says that when he got to the polls those men took the ballot-box away from him; that he remonstrated, and they gave it back to him; that they took charge of the poll, saying they "did not care for the d—d negro officer nor the soldiers that had charge of the poll, and they were going to run it," &c.

V. M. Lange, colored, was the other republican commissioner. Mr. Lange is a man of sound sense and unquestioned character. He was a member of the constitutional convention in 1867-'68, and of the Legislature in 1868; was the most active and influential colored republican in the parish, and made speeches in several of the wards during the last canvass, and was well received and well treated wherever he went by white and black. He contradicts most positively the statement of Williams. Lange swears that the voting at that precinct was peaceable and quiet. He says: "Those that desired to vote the republican ticket, did so. There were two tickets on the table, democratic and republican. Some gentlemen who came in had tickets, and some had not; and whenever they came in without a ticket, the commissioners showed them the two tickets." He says the colored men at that precinct did all the electioneering. Another witness swears that he was with Williams that morning when the two men on horseback met them. He says these two men used no angry or insulting words, but simply inquired of Williams if he was one of the commissioners.

POLL 6.

J. L. Lapierre is the republican commissioner, who complains as to poll 6, in ward 4. His statement was not corroborated by three witnesses, and was, therefore, as well as for other reasons, wholly insufficient.

It will be remembered that the box for this poll is one of the boxes which, after much entreaty, was opened by the board.

He says that some unauthorized person insisted that he should not be permitted to take charge of the papers; that they should be locked up in the box. He says also, "the reason I did not bring the tally-sheet to town was because I could not convince these people that the records should be intrusted to me." It seems that the papers were locked up in the box and taken to the supervisor, well guarded by "thirty-five or forty horsemen." Lapierre leading the advance.

Alonzo Woods, democrat, and Gustave Le Blanc, colored republicans, were the other commissioners. Woods swears there was no intimidation, and that he gave out republican tickets himself. Le Blanc swears that everything was quiet, and that there was no trouble at all; that there was no disorderly conduct, or ugly behavior on the part of anybody.

But, Mr. Speaker, to cap the climax as to this poll, Mr. Lapierre himself appeared and testified that it was a quiet and peaceable election. Says he attended republican meetings in the first, second, sixth, and ninth wards and saw no disturbance. That he was in the parish during the canvass and saw no conduct on the part of democrats calculated to keep men from voting as they desired. He expresses the opinion that a quarrel which took place in the republican convention last September in the city of Baton Rouge, when Gilbert Carter and O'Connor were forced off the ticket, created great dissatisfaction, and contributed largely to the defeat of the republican party in that parish. Mr. Lapierre is the foreman of the Republican printing office in Baton Rouge, and says he has always been treated well by the democrats, many of whom take his paper.

POLL 7.

H. F. Billups, republican, is the commissioner who complains as to poll 7, (Port Hudson,) ward 5.

He says that democrats marched colored men up to the polls and compelled them to vote the democratic ticket; that republicans were not allowed to vote until three or four o'clock, and that a deputy United States marshal was threatened with arrest if he did not stop distributing republican tickets.

Mr. Speaker, I have already called attention to the fact that four colored republicans made affidavit before the board that they voted the republican ticket at the poll without molestation. There were 92 republican votes cast at that poll; nearly, if not quite all, must have been colored. I now submit the affidavit of A. H. Levi, esq. This affidavit was furnished to the returning-board while it was entertaining and considering as evidence ex parte affidavits:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of East Baton Rouge:

Personally came and appeared before me, the undersigned authority, a justice of the peace in and for said parish and State, holding in the first ward, city of Baton Rouge, A. Levi, now residing in said city, who, on oath, does depose and say that he is a colored man; raised in the State of Massachusetts, where he was admitted as an attorney at law; that for the last two years he has been following his profession in the parish and city of Baton Rouge. Avers that at the election for State and national officers held on the 7th day of November, 1876, this present month and year, he was a United States supervisor of election for the fifth ward of said parish; that he was present when the voting began, and remained until the last ballot was counted by the commissioners; that he saw no threats, act of violence, or intimidation used by either political party for the purpose of preventing or obstructing any person, either white or black, from exercising the right of suffrage as they thought best. The voting was done by both parties in a quiet and orderly manner. There was a feeling of kindness manifested by both white and black, democrats and republicans. I am and have always been a pronounced republican; advocated, publicly and privately, the election of the national and State republican ticket, and so voted on day of the election. Was appointed a United States supervisor in the interest of the republican party.

A. H. LEVI.

Sworn to and subscribed before me officially this the 20th day of November, A. D. 1876.

F. W. NEPHLER,
Justice of the Peace.

POLL 8.

Oliver McKitrick, republican commissioner, makes the following allegation as to what occurred on the day of the election at poll 8, ward 6. He says:

That on the day of election, at and near the said poll, there were menaces, threats, violence, and other acts of intimidation used which tended to prevent and did prevent a fair, free, and peaceable full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish.

A. Williams, colored republican, swears that he visited this ward and saw nothing that could interfere with a fair registration and vote. He also swears that the election throughout the parish was quiet. He is the business manager of the Grand Era, the republican paper of that parish.

Mortimer Price, a colored man seventy-five years old, who voted at this poll, swears that all was quiet so far as he could see. Says that he knows of "no threats before the election nor dissatisfaction afterward;" says he is a republican, but does "not follow party discipline;" that he voted the democratic ticket believing that good would follow. William Martin was the democratic commissioner at this poll. He swears that the election passed off in good order and was in all respects fair; says, also, that he attended a republican meeting in this ward, and that it was held without difficulty or disorder. Unless Mr. Martin is to be discredited because he is white and votes the democratic ticket, his testimony cannot be disregarded.

POLL 9.

J. P. Furlow, one of the republican commissioners for poll 9, ward 7, says there was intimidation, &c., at the polls. This statement is not corroborated by three witnesses and therefore might be dismissed without further notice.

W. H. Patterson, the other republican commissioner for this poll, swears that it was quiet there, and that he saw no intimidation or unfair treatment of the colored voters.

V. M. Lange, the colored republican speaker already referred to, testified that he spoke in this ward. He swore as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

Question. Did you speak at any other point?
Answer. Yes, sir; I spoke my very first speech in the seventh ward.
Q. You may state how that meeting went off.
A. I disremember the date, but the first speech I attempted to make in this last campaign—it was the first place that I was invited to. On that occasion Colonel Smith, myself, and Mr. Bird, and several other gentlemen spoke.
Q. You may state as to whether any of the speakers were colored men as well as yourself.
A. Colonel Smith, the present recorder, is a white gentleman. I spoke before him. There was another gentleman, colored, that spoke previous to me, and I spoke myself; I was listened to by the gentlemen on the outside of the fence and those that were on the inside, and those that were on the outside and could not hear came on the inside and paid particular attention, and behaved themselves beautifully in my presence. When Colonel Smith drove up and spoke they paid particular attention to his remarks. If I am not mistaken there was a gentleman there, Mr. William Bates, who was in company with several gentlemen, who said, "That is a gentleman. It gives me pleasure to hear him speak."
Q. Was that a white man?
A. Yes, sir. Colonel Smith was speaking, and Mr. Bates was a white gentleman, belonging to the democratic party.

It will be borne in mind that poll 9 is in ward 7.

POLL 12.

John McVeltz, republican commissioner for poll 12, ward 10, makes statement of intimitation; that colored men were marched up to the polls and required to vote the democratic ticket, &c.

The testimony of Frank Everson and other colored witnesses refutes this statement conclusively.

V. M. Lange made republican speeches in this ward.

POLL 13.

Cyrus Strother and James Casby, the republican commissioners for poll 13, in ward 11, gave separate statements.

They charge that there was intimidation; that republican tickets were not allowed to be distributed, &c. Casby says that at night, when counting the tickets, the democrats crowded in and filled up the room, and made the republican commissioner correct his tally-sheet to conform to that made out by a democratic by-stander, and that the original records were afterward lost or carried away by some person.

This poll was democratic by a majority of 162. If the original records were lost or destroyed, how and by whom? What party would lose by their loss or destruction? Would democrats be parties to an act of which the returning board would be only too glad to take advantage? The returning board, with this statement of Casby's before it, made no effort to find out what had become of these papers. Does any sane man believe that the board would have been so indifferent if the majority had been the other way?

It is very clear from the testimony of W. E. Adkinson that the papers referred to were purposely "lost or carried away."

POLL 14.

Henry Raymond is the republican commissioner who complains of poll 14, ward 12:

That on the said day of election, at or near the said poll, there were threats, menances, violences, and other acts of intimidation, which tended to prevent, and did prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish. The facts relating thereto are as follows: It was not safe for a colored man to vote the republican ticket.

The utter want of specific statement as to what transpired on the day of the election will be observed.

V. M. Lange swears that he made a republican speech in this ward. He says:

We fired, I suppose, about four or five cannon, calling the people to assemble—notifying them. We took them on surprise, and we fired cannon, and the people immediately gathered the moment that they heard the cannon.

He says there were democrats present, and they paid particular attention to the speeches and made no disturbance. He says that himself and the other speakers were cheered by the republicans when they concluded. He says that this meeting was held to rally the republicans of that ward to attend a republican barbecue to be held in Baton Rouge.

(See testimony of Rev. R. F. Patterson, Presbyterian clergyman from the North, as to this ward and the parish generally, page 49.)

The first democratic-conservative club in the parish was organized in this ward. It contained ninety-seven colored men, some of whom had always been democrats.

See further testimony as to this ward on pages 48, 91, 93, 95, 98.

We find, upon examination, that over three hundred citizens of this parish made affidavit before the returning board that the election was in all respects fair, free, and without intimidation. More than half of these affidavits were made by colored voters.

Charles E. Doyle, a republican justice of the peace, testified as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

Question. In what ward do you live?
Answer. The second ward.
Q. Is that in this city?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You are a magistrate, are you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you attend at any voting-places the day of election in this city?
A. I voted in the second ward. I was around at all polls in the town here.
Q. State how the election went off.
A. Peaceably and quietly, as far as I saw, sir, at each poll here in town.
Q. Have any complaints been filed with you or made before you on account of any difficulties on the day of election?
A. Not any, sir.
Q. During the period of registration, say between the 28th of August and the 28th of October, what was the state and condition of the city and parish, so far as known to you, as to a quiet and orderly state of things?
A. It was very quiet so far as I know. I was in the house most of the time. I have been sick for a long time. I didn't hear of any difficulties that I can remember.
Q. You have no recollection of any complaints made to you or during that period?
A. I know that there has been none made to me directly.
Q. What do you know on the subject of colored men voting the republican or democratic ticket of their own free will, or on account of intimidation, or what upon the subject do you know?
A. I have been called upon to make affidavits from republicans and democrats, colored men, and they all testified that they all went to the poll and voted without intimidation—no trouble whatever.
Q. Were these affidavits made before you for the purpose of being used at New Orleans?
A. Some were printed blanks, and some were written out—some I wrote out. Those for the republicans—we had no blank form for them—about as many republicans as there were democrats.
Q. They testified before you that they voted the republican ticket of their own free will, and without any intimidation?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. And affidavits of like import as to the democratic ticket were made by colored democrats?
A. Yes, sir; so they said. This was outside of the parish, and the same in town.
Q. About how many such affidavits were made before you?
A. As far as I can recollect there may have been some three hundred, probably about three hundred.
Q. Mostly from the country?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. About equally divided as to politics?
A. Yes, sir; very near. I think there was two or three more democratic affidavits than there was republicans.
Q. You have been confined to the house so that you have not been circulating through the parish?
A. Just got out previous to the election—about a week or so.
Q. What is your politics?
A. Republican, sir.

Lieutenant William Gerlach, of the United States Army, stationed at Baton Rouge, and who favored the election of Hayes, gave the following sworn statement which was before the returning board.

BATON ROUGE, November 16, 1876.

Hon. L. JASTREMSKI, Mayor, and Dr. J. W. DUPREE, City:

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request of this morning I take pleasure to furnish you the following account of my personal observations of the manner in which the election was conducted here on the 7th instant, and how the canvass of the votes has been conducted since.

I was present on the morning of election-day when a report was made to my commanding officer, Lieutenant Charles Brooks, of a difficulty about appointment of commissioners at the Murphy school-house poll, and I accompanied him to a conference between leaders of both political parties. I saw and bear witness to the fact that the representatives of the democratic party did all in their power to make a fair arrangement of the matter possible. Before a conclusion was arrived at I proceeded with Dr. Dupree, democrat, and C. Le Sage, republican, to the third ward polling-place to investigate a report made by one Shields, (colored,) who stated that he had been roughly handled and ejected from the room where the ballot-box was located by one Duncan, although he (Shields) was a United States deputy marshal.

We rode out there (six miles from the city) at a very rapid gait. While en route Le Sage stated that upon the least sign of intimidation he would, as supervisor, close the polls. To such a proceeding Dr. Dupree objected, as Le Sage had accompanied us simply in his private character as a representative of the republican party. Upon my remarking that such a course was not expected when Colonel Brooks directed me to investigate the facts jointly with him, Le Sage and Dr. Dupree, and that I would, if necessary, remain and see peace kept there until I could get further instructions, by sending back a mounted orderly I had with me, Le Sage abandoned the idea. Upon our arrival at the polls, I found everything perfectly peaceable. Excepting Le Sage, who carried a pistol, and my orderly, I saw no armed men there. There were no arms in the house where the ballot-box was located. All persons present were sober and orderly. After careful investigation, particularly among colored men present, and after hearing the statement of the republican commissioner, whom I saw alone, I became satisfied that the story of the negro Shields was false. On the opening of the poll he had entered the room where the ballot-box was located, and was removed therefrom by order of the commissioners, (who were enforcing the rule that no voter should at any time be within thirty feet of the box,) by one Duncan, who was acting officially, as supervisor or constable. Upon asserting that he (Shields) was a deputy marshal, he was requested by the republican commissioner and Duncan to return, and assured that he should not be molested, but left nevertheless, stating that he was going to the barracks to report them and send the military after them. I was treated by all present with the utmost courtesy. No one attempted to prevent a free and full investigation, nor could I perceive any displeasure on account of my calling aside colored men and examining them alone. Le Sage assured me himself that he was convinced Shields had made an utterly false report. In returning and going, I watched closely all roads in sight, and I failed to see any pickets anywhere. Every colored man I met assured me that he had not been molested going to or coming from town. I was particularly struck with the friendly feeling that existed among the whites and negroes gathered near the polls, and the republican commissioner assured me he apprehended no trouble. Upon inquiry he further told me that as most of the supporters of the republican ticket had been ordered by their leaders to town to vote, but few republican votes would be cast there.

Upon returning to town I was met by stories (told by radical politicians) that an express had heralded our coming to the men at the third ward, that a man had been shot there, &c. The gait at which I rode going to the place made the former impossible, and I could not find the wounded man, who was said to be in town, in spite of my making dilligent inquiry. I have seen an article in the New Orleans Republican of the 15th instant relative to affairs in the third ward, and I am free to say that the statement therein made is utterly false to the best of my knowledge. After returning from the country and reporting to my commanding officer, I visited frequently every voting-place in the city. Everywhere voting was quietly progressing. Excepting attempts to coax black men to vote the democratic ticket, no attempt was made to influence their action. I failed to see any ground for the complaint made to me repeatedly by republican politicians that it was dangerous for a man to vote the republican ticket. The utmost care appeared to have been taken to preserve the peace, and the authority of the United States was nowhere questioned. On the contrary, when it became necessary to confer with civil powers, they showed the utmost willingness to do what was correct and fair. Upon a complaint being made by Deputy Marshal McAlpin that he was annoyed in the performance of his duty near the court-house voting-place by the city police stationed about there, they were at once withdrawn by order of the mayor, and when, by some misunderstanding of orders, they again went into the hall, the mayor and chief of police went in person and superintended their removal.

One thing was quite apparent, the democratic side worked hard, by all fair means, to induce colored men to vote their ticket, while but little effort to the same end was perceptible on the part of their opponents. I remained near the different polls until late at night, and convinced myself by actual observation that the count was progressing fairly, and that no danger need be feared of any interference by unauthorized parties. About one a. m. on the morning of the 8th I was called from my bed and directed by my commanding officer to go to the court-house and see what action was required to protect the deputy marshal and officers of election there, it having been reported to him that they were in danger of being interfered with. Upon arriving there I found the deputy marshal, McAlpin, quite excited. I told him he need not fear anything. Upon this he remarked that a crowd could come in and kill him before any aid could be had from the garrison; that he had heard parties say in the yard "their majority here won't do them much good," (referring to republican votes cast there.) Beyond this and the fact that some members of the democratic party had been there to witness the count, I could find no reason for his fears. To assure him, however, I requested the chief of police to station some men near to prevent the approach of unauthorized parties, and he complied promptly by detailing picked men for that duty. I myself remained until after four a. m., when I left, sending a sergeant to take my place; he, in turn, was relieved by nine a. m. Neither myself nor the non-commissioned officers on duty could see any, even the most remote, cause for uneasiness on the score of the safety of the election-officers or ballots. The count was peaceably completed at the other places in town. I again, by order, was present during the greater part of the time, while Mr. Clover was compiling the returns made by local commissioners. He was treated with perfect courtesy by all men of the democratic party who had business with him. They made every effort to comply with his directions, and in spite of very impolite treatment they received at the hands of some of Mr. Clover's subordinates, (I was present when this occurred several times,) they kept their tempers and acted very fair, indeed.

While on this duty I saw the only real case of intimidation which has come to my personal notice since I have been in Baton Rouge. Mr. Guy Samuels, a native of Virginia, and now a planter near Port Hudson, was approached by a negro, when outside of the court-house, where he, Samuels, had been on duty in connection with election mattters in his ward. The negro used the most abusive language imaginable. Mr. Samuels assured him that any fears on account of political opinions or actions he might have were groundless, and invited him to come and gather his crop, offering him a place to sleep in his own dwelling while there, and promised to protect him. All this had no effect, and the negro continued his threats and abuse, his manner showing that he relied on my presence there for impunity from the punishment at Mr. Samuels's hands he rightly deserved. While on duty guarding Mr. Clover and the deputy marshall against apprehended dangers I was always unarmed. At no time was there, as far as I could perceive, any necessity for my presence. I am convinced now that under any ordinary circumstances my uniform as United States officer is sufficient protection against any violence, in performing any duty, such as assisting a marshal in making an arrest, or the like.

I have above given simply a statement of what I saw myself. I have purposely avoided making any remarks on the conduct of the officers sent here to conduct the election, although it appeared strange to me that they should be on the most intimate terms with leaders and candidates for office on the republican side, and consult with them often in the course of their official labors. The following facts should, however, be well known:

While on duty at the court-house, I was approached in a very confidential manner by one Baranco, (colored,) who had, if my memory is correct, acted in some capacity at the engine-house poll, and who claims to be a deputy United States marshal. He informed me that they (the radicals) had fixed the democrats by locking up tally-sheets and other papers in the ballot-boxes in places where a democratic majority was cast. I was also informed later by Mr. Clover that he had completed his returns so far as he could under instructions, excepting some remarks he kept in his head, which he would add after he got safely in the city, (New Orleans.)

That the statement I have here made may be correctly judged, I will state that I have never been an active partisan of any political party. I have been in the United States Army continuously since 1856, and a reference to my testimony given before a congressional committee in New Orleans in 1875, with a letter published in the appendix to their report, will show that I have always pleaded for the rights of the negro.

Going back a short time when the canvass was in full blast, I attended a democratic meeting held here, followed by a barbecue. I there noticed that the negroes were fully impressed with the arguments there advocated; that they liked and believed the promises made to them regarding schools and other privileges. I have been assured by several negroes that they voted the democratic ticket because they were satisfied their master's (employer's) interests were their own, and because they did not like men put on the republican ticket.

Many more reasons were given me in detail for similar action (turning democrat) by negroes who approached me confidentially, asking advice how they should vote at the approaching election.

Giving you my free consent to use this statement in any manner you desire, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant.

WM. GERLACH,
Second Lieutenant Fifth Infantry, United States Army.

Sworn to and subscribed before—

F. A. NEPHLER,
Justice of the Peace.

Gerlach testified to the same effect before subcommittee, (see page 23.) Also see Lieutenant Holmes's testimony before the House committee at New Orleans.

There were over five hundred colored members of democratic-conservative clubs in this parish. In every club colored men were the leading officers. No one can read the testimony without being convinced that the colored democratic voters not only cast their ballots in good faith, but did it with enthusiasm.

We refer to the testimony of Zebulon Lange and Edward Plunket, both colored, on pages 113 and 114, as giving an intelligent account of how the colored people felt and how the canvass was conducted with reference to the colored vote.

After the right of suffrage was conferred upon the colored people, men from other sections of the country, most of whom had been unappreciated at home, notwitlstanding their loud protestations of devotion to the Union, went among the colored people asking and receiving office at their hands. Those men were not only thus placed in office without the consent of the white race, but, discovering that the latter must in the very nature of things soon exercise a large influence over the colored people, they devoted themselves exclusively to the work of keeping in office and their colored constituency organized for united work at the ballot-box. The result was that these office-holders had no other interest in the country than to procure office, and it was so manifest even to them that no distant day would find the negro with his eyes open, that it made the scramble intense and bitter for place, each one fearing that the harvest would be gone before he would be provided for.

The courts were presided over by strangers, in many cases without either capacity or character.

A large proportion of the parochial offices, such as clerk of the court, sheriff, tax-collector, police jurors, &c., were held by colored men, most of whom of necessity were wholly unfitted for those positions. Can it be wondered at that the white people became dissatisfied and asked such men to resign? Would a northern community have been more tolerant?

Mr. Speaker, about the time this state of things had become as bad as it could be, a new element or cause of disorder made its appearance. The stealing of hogs, cattle, cotton in the seed, &c., became very frequent in all the parishes embraced in this report. The defiance and boldness of the guilty parties was such as to provoke to the last degree those who sustained losses. The stealing of cotton in the seed—that is, before it had been ginned—was carried on so extensively that small stores were established by unscrupulous men at various points in the parishes for its purchase. For a time the courts and law officers were appealed to for redress. It was impossible, in most cases, to obtain conviction. The juries would generally be composed, in part at least, of persons in sympathy with the offenders. The belief became prevalent among those who were the sufferers that the courts and officers thereof winked at the packing of juries in the interest of these evil-doers. It was while the public mind was thus agitated and incensed that the parish judge and some other officers in this parish were requested to resign, and did resign in 1875.

In the latter part of the year 1874 the people most interested determined that their property should no longer be taken by persons having no right thereto. Companies called regulators or bull-dozers were formed, and thereafter, until early in the year 1876, they made themselves active in lynching those then engaged in stealing, or who had been guilty of it. These companies were made up of young men in a large degree, and, as is always the case when unlawful and unauthorized punishment is meted out by self-constituted conservators of law and order, excesses were committed which cannot be justified. These chastisements were always summary, and often very severe, in some instances to the extent of taking life. The stores of democrats, white men, engaged in purchasing stolen cotten, were burned. Among the democrats whose stores were thus destroyed in this parish are Nicholas Wax, W. R. Bates, T. D. Schloss, T. B. Brown, and Mr. Ligor. After this, as retaliatory, several cotton-gins were burned. It will be found, Mr. Speaker, upon examination of the testimony, that it conclusively appears that politics was not involved in the lynchings which occurred in this parish. There was no political excitement during that period, and no election exciting any interest, except that for mayor of the city of Baton Rouge, in April, 1876, when the democratic candidate for mayor was elected by a majority of 345 votes, the city before that having been republican by several hundred. The democratic candidate for mayor was supported in the most earnest manner by a large number of colored men. It is not pretended that there was the slightest intimidation of the colored vote at this election. This was the beginning of the first considerable organized break in the ranks of the colored republican voters in this parish, and occurring, as it did, immediately preceding the presidential canvass, was of great aid to the democratic party throughout the parish, and contributed largely to its success in November. Of this there can be no doubt whatever. The democratic candidates for electors fairly received a majority of 612 in this parish.

WEST FELICIANA.

There are twelve wards in this parish. The supervisor of registration refused to establish polls in wards 8 and 12, and in violation of the law located the polling-places for those wards in ward 1, in which is Saint Francisville, the parish site. Thus three polls were located at the court-house in a town of only a few hundred inhabitants, where one would have been ample if the law had been complied with as to wards 8 and 12.

The following table gives the vote as cast in this parish. It will be seen that it is prepared as though an election was in fact held in wards 8 and 12. As already explained this was not the fact, the polls for those wards, so to speak, having been located in ward 1.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of West Feliciana:

I hereby certify the above and foregoing to be a true and correct compilation of all the statements of votes for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States at the election precinct of the parish of West Feliciana at the general election held November 7, 1876, under the provisions of an act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections, &c., approved November 20, 1872, and the amendments thereto rendered to me by the commissioners of election, on file in my office; that no affidavits of riots, tumults, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbances, bribery or corrupt influences, were attached to said statements of votes, or presented for filing in my office, and no protest of the supervisor of registration was filed or offered to be filed in connection with said statements of votes, under section 26 of the aforesaid act of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

Given under my official signature and seal of office the 28th day of December, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] CHAS. J. HOWELL,
Clerk of the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District of the State of Louisiana, in and for the Parish of West Feliciana.

D. A. Weber, the supervisor of registration, in his consolidated statement of the vote cast, returned the full vote without at that time protest, remarks, comment, or criticism. His consolidated statement or return was sworn to on the 9th day of November, before the clerk of the district court of the parish. It will be seen by the certificate of the clerk that the supervisor never filed with him a statement, as provided for in section 26 relative to intimidation, &c., during the time of registration or revision of registration. Neither did the commissioners of elections file statement with the supervisor and clerk of the court, or either of them, as to intimidation, &c., on the day of the election, as provided for in said section. There were no such statements of commissioners of election before the returning board, and hence the latter had no jurisdiction or power to inquire as to what did or did not occur on the day of the election except to ascertain the number of votes cast, for whom, and make an honest declaration of the result.

It was not until the 14th of November that the supervisor made protest, as follows:

I, D. A. Weber, the undersigned, being supervisor of registration in and for the parish of West Feliciana and State of Louisiana, do on this 14th day of November, 1876, make this my protest against counting the votes in the following-named polling places, and for the reasons stated below, to wit:

Ward No. 2.—Intimidation.—Five men were discharged in this ward by William Ball (white democrat) for refusing to sign a pledge to vote the democratic ticket.

Ward No. 3.—Intimidation.—United States supervisor and republican canvasser, with tickets, driven from the poll by armed men and not permitted to distribute republican tickets. Witnesses, Valentine Emory and Howard Thornton, jr.

Ward No. 4.—General intimidation and discharge from employment.

Ward No. 5.—General intimidation and discharge from employment.

Ward No. 10.—Intimidation.—Littleton Cotton and R. J. Hogan, prominent republican leaders, threatened with death, and actually assaulted by prominent democrats, because they refused to pledge themselves to vote the democratic ticket.

I also protest against the votes to the number of voted in the ninth ward on affidavits without registration papers, said affidavits being made before one John Ring, who was not a justice of the peace or authorized to administer oaths. Vide affidavits marked A, and commission and oath of L. Vresinsky, marked B, accompanying this protest.

This paper was utterly void for non-conformity with law. It was not corroborated by three witnesses, nor does it allege that during registration or revision of registration there was intimidation or corrupt influences of any kind preventing or tending to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election. In law this so-called protest was but blank paper and could not confer jurisdiction upon the board to examine as to anything that occurred either before or on the day of election. The protest is addressed to polls 2, 3, 4, 5, and 10. The returning board not only threw out these polls, each of which gave democratic majorities and which gave an aggregate democratic majority of 736, but not content with this base and villainous act rejected poll 9, not complained of by the supervisor, (except in a qualified form which does not impeach the fairness of the vote,) which gave a democratic majority of 120.

WARD 2.

The supervisor's charge as to the poll in this ward was absolutely false. The allegation as to discharge of men by William Ball is denied and satisfactorily explained to the most prejudiced mind. (See testimony on page 140.) The election in this ward was "fair, square, and peaceable." So testifies Henry Perkins, who was a candidate on the republican ticket, was counted in by the returning board, but declined to accept the office upon the ground that his opponent was fairly elected.

But one witness made affidavit before the returning board that the election here was not fair, while eighteen, most of whom were colored, made affidavit that the election there was in all respects fair and free.

WARD 3.

The supervisor's complaint as to the poll in this ward is that a United States supervisor and republican canvasser was driven away from the polls by armed men, and not permitted to distribute republican tickets. Valentine Emory and Howard Thornton are referred to as witnesses. Emory's name does not appear among the persons whose affidavits were read before the board, while the affidavit of Thornton makes no allusion whatever to a United States supervisor, republican canvasser, or any other person in any manner interfered with on the day of election. Nor does he speak of anything occurring at the election, lawful or unlawful.

Julius Green made affidavit before the board that there was intimidation, but he makes no reference to the fact asserted by the supervisor.

Cornelius Smith, the United States supervisor referred to by the supervisor of registration, made affidavit before the board, but does not pretend that he was driven away or in any manner maltreated. He says that armed democrats intimidated colored voters on the way to this poll and at the same. Only a few days before that this same Cornelius Smith swore that at this poll "the election was peaceful and quiet, that he saw no intimidation of voters, and that the colored people voted as they pleased without hinderance." He does not in his subsequent affidavit make any reference to his conflicting statements.

Thirty-five persons, most of whom were colored, made affidavits before the board that they were present at this poll and that there was no disturbance or intimidation of any kind. Shall they be believed or must Smith be credited, who swears both ways? They swear there was the usual amount of electioneering but it was entirely legitimate, and that all persons, white and colored, exercised their right of suffrage without force, let, or hinderance; that the colored people especially crowded the polls of their own accord and voted as they pleased; that they saw no one with arms at the polls or in going to or returning therefrom, nor had they heard of any armed men, or men of any kind, preventing colored voters from going to the polls and voting as they preferred. They all swear that peace and good order prevailed and that the election passed off quietly; that State peace officers and United States supervisors of both parties were present and not an arrest was made, nor was there any complaint by any person. How testimony could be more conclusive we cannot see. The board wholly disregarded it, believing no doubt that they were serving those thirty-five witnesses, white and black, right for voting the democratic ticket.

WARD 4.

"General intimidation and discharge from employment" is the language of the supervisor's protest as to this poll.

But four persons made affidavit before the board impeaching in any manner this poll. One of these says there was intimidation. This man, William D. Postlethwaite, was the republican candidate for sheriff. He swore, nine days after the election, that he voted the republican ticket at this poll; that there was no intimidation; that the colored people voted as they pleased, and that peace and good order prevailed. Another says that a democrat was engaged in taking down the names of persons as they voted. How often this is done in the North by both parties, for the purpose of knowing who should be sent for, is well understood. Another says that he "saw three colored men dragged up to the polls and made to vote the democratic ticket," &c. How these persons were dragged, and how they were made to vote the democratic ticket, we are not informed. Another says that he resides in this ward and usually votes there. He does not say that he voted there at the late election or that he was present. He says that men came to him and said that they wanted to vote the republican ticket but did not, fearing that they would be run out of the parish. It is a sufficient answer to this to say that in all the ex parte stuff filed before the returning board and received as evidence there is not one case shown where a voter has been run out of this or any other parish on account of voting the republican ticket.

Sixty-nine persons, mostly colored, made affidavit before the board that the election was orderly and without intimidation.

WARD 5.

"General intimidation and discharge from employment" is the supervisor's charge as to this poll.

I have examined with the utmost care the affidavits and answers to interrogatories before the returning board, and do not find a single complaint as to this poll. One hundred and nine persons, white and colored, made affidavit before the board that the election was fair and without unlawful interference of any kind.

WARD 9.

There were only two affidavits before the returning board by persons residing in or complaining of this ward or poll—John Lagadie and Charles Drake. The former does not say that he was there on the day of the election, nor does he make any reference to the election in that ward. The affidavit of Drake alleges that Frank Powell, D. Hale, and Henry Miskey tried to make him vote against his will. These parties positively contradict Drake, and so state the circumstances as to not leave the slightest doubt of their truthfulness.

(See testimony before subcommittee, pages 225, and 226.)

Forty-five affidavits were presented to the returning board by both white and colored, attesting the fairness of the election at this poll. (See also testimony before subcommittee, pages 190 and 191.)

WARD 10.

R. J. Hogan's affidavit was presented to the returning board charging intimidation at this poll and in this ward. Mr. Hogan appeared before the committee at New Orleans and swore that the election was fair, free, and peaceable. That he knew of no intimidation of voters except at the Acklen poll, (ward 7) where colored republicans were threatening to kill colored men who should vote the democratic ticket. He further swears that the affidavit which he signed, and which was used before the returning board, was not written in conformity with the statements he made at that time. (See his testimony before subcommittee of MORRISON, JENKS, and TOWNSEND, volume 1, page 25.) The affidavits of one hundred and fifteen men, white and colored, were before the returning board that the election at this poll was entirely free and fair. (See also testimony before subcommittee, pages 159, 161, 166, 167, 171, 172, 174, 176, 198, 201, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, and 219.)

It is clearly established by the testimony of every witness who was examined on that point that the lynchings which have occurred in this parish had no political significance whatever. The democrats have more just ground of complaint on this score than their opponents, the democratic candidate for sheriff having been assassinated a few days before the election. As to the canvass and election in this parish, I invite especial attention to the testimony of Brevet Major G. M. Bascom, Lieutenant James Fornance, Lieutenant M. F. Jamar, and Timothy Murry, first sergeant. (See testimony before subcommittee, pages 232, 237, 238, and 241.)

There were sixteen democratic-conservative clubs in this parish containing 1,126 colored members.

It has been asserted that republican meetings could not be held in this parish. We clip from the Feliciana Ledger, the republican paper of the parish, the following notices of republican meetings held there during the late canvass:

Rally, republicans, rally!—A grand mass-meeting will be held and barbecue given on Monday, the 6th day of November, at the court-house in Saint Francisville.

A grand republican mass-meeting will be held and barbecue given on Monday, the 6th of November, at the court-house in Saint Francisville.

The mass-meeting will be addressed by the following speakers: Hon. E. L. Weber, Hon. George A. Swayze, Hon. J. W. Armstead, J. R. Watson, Philip Brown, Lucius Early, J. S. Dula.

How republican Feliciana greets her future governor, Colonel Packard.

Two thousand persons turn out to hear him—He creates the wildest enthusiasm—The barbecue a grand success—Order and decorum prevails—Democrats present eat republican beef and hog meat, and drink republican beer—Kelly's brass band discourses fine music, and makes everybody perfectly happy—Speeches of General Campbell, Colonel Jack Wharton, Colonel James Lewis, Hon. J. P. Harris, and Hon. Milton Jones.

A large and enthusiastic mass-meeting and barbecue at Williamsport.

A large and enthusiastic meeting and barbecue were held at Williamsport in Pointe Coupée yesterday evening, at which there was present Colonel S. B. Packard, James Lewis, General Campbell, General Wharton, Captain John Yoist, Major Jones, Captain Paul Polite, Senator Weber, Messrs. Postlethwaite, Swayze, Armstead, Watson, and Dula.

Kelly's brass band enlivened the occasion with music. Fully four thousand persons were present.

Speeches were made by Hon. J. P. Harris, Colonel S. B. Packard, General Wharton, Colonel James Lewis, and Senator Weber. The utmost good feeling and harmony prevailed. Many democrats were present, and listened attentively and decorously. The meeting was a perfect success, and showed conclusively that Pointe Coupée was solid for the republican party. Many cheers were given for Packard, Yoist, Hayes and Wheeler, and Senator Weber, after which the party was escorted to the Era No. 9 by fully five hundred mounted horsemen.

RACCOURCI, October 22, 1876.

There was a grand turn-out of the republicans of this parish at the splendid barbecue given by Hon. Emile Honore. Notwithstanding the storm of the last fourteen hours, the people began to assemble at twelve o'clock m., and at this writing, three o'clock p. m., have assembled to the number of five hundred persons.

Republican mass-meeting in Pointe Coupée.

The republicans of Pointe Coupée held a large and enthusiastic meeting on Saturday evening, October 28, in the first ward. Long before the hour of assembling the place of meeting was thronged by hundreds from all parts of the parish. At one o'clock Hon. Milton Jones, of Pointe Coupée called the meeting to order. The audience was largely composed of whites—democrats and republicans.

Acklain's settlement all right.

Yesterday a large and enthusiastic meeting was held at Acklain's and addressed by Colonel James Lewis, General Jack Wharton, and Senator Weber. Cornelius Washington presided, and the utmost harmony prevailed. The speakers were repeatedly cheered while speaking, particularly by the colored ladies, who were very enthusiastic. Colonel Packard, General Campbell, Hon. J. P. Hewes, and other distinguished gentlemen were present.

Acklain's settlement is all right, and will give the republican party 300 majority. Cheer boys; victory is ours.

EAST FELICIANA.

There are eight wards in this parish. The vote cast for presidential electors was 1,736, all of which were for the democratic electors.

The following is a tabular statement of the votes cast for electors, by wards, in this parish:

The consolidated return of James E. Anderson, supervisor of registration in this parish, was filed with the returning board November 13, without remarks. No protest, or paper purporting to be a protest, was filed by him with the board until November 23, which was received by the board in a separate package. He does not allege in his protest that anything occurred during the period of registration or revision of registration to prevent a fair and full registration. He was absent from the parish during the last nineteen days of the period fixed by law for registration. No voters were registered during those nineteen days.

Anderson says in his protest that he was unable to remain in the parish longer on account of the insecurity of his life; that an attempt was made to take his life. He returned before the election, not in time to renew registration, but in time to appoint election officers. He appointed for each poll, as commissioners, two republicans and one democrat, all of whom served.

The proof shows that it was and is the better opinion of those who investigated the alleged attempt to take his life, that he did the shooting himself. Captain Benjamin H. Rogers, of the United States Army, Colonel Frank Powers, and J. P. Monyhan, the two former republicans and the latter a democrat and sheriff of the parish, gave the subject a careful investigation. Captain Rogers swears that he never could fully satisfy himself whether Anderson was shot at or not; says that if it had been any other man than Anderson he might not have been so much in doubt; but says, "I could not believe him under oath, in any way, shape, or form." He further says, "I doubted that he was shot at for this reason, that he is such a trickster that I would not place any confidence in him in any shape or manner. I think he is a man who would be liable to shoot at his own coat in order to make political capital out of it." Says that Colonel Powers expressed the opinion it was a "put-up job" by Anderson himself, and that that was his [Rogers's] impression at the time. Captain Rogers further testified as follows: "I never did think the democratic party had anything to do with it." He says there was some testimony before the parish judge that looked like a certain man of Anderson's own party might have done it. The man here referred to is one P. Charles Butler, an outlaw, and the dread for years past of the parish, especially of the colored people. Monyhan expresses the belief that Anderson did the shooting himself. It was proven before the Morrison New Orleans subcommittee that Anderson had at one time said that he could prove by incontestible evidence the existence on the part of the republican party of a conspiracy to throw out the parishes of East Baton Rouge, West and East Feliciana, Ouachita, Morehouse, and Grant; and he offered to place in the possession of the democrats for the sum of $4,000 information that would expose the conspiracy and save to the democrats their majority in East Feliciana. His offer was declined.

I do not believe this to be true. No one but himself would have known that he had made a protest. And why postpone writing it for ten days? In all that he has to say in his protest he mentions but one name besides his own; that of Lieutenant W. S. Davies, of the Thirteenth United States Infantry. He says that Davies was shot at. Davies, in answer to interrogatories before the returning board, distinctly asserts that he does "not believe that there was anything political in the matter." He also testified before subcommittee, and did not even allude to having been shot at.

No statements by commissioners of election, as provided for in section 26 of the election law of Louisiana, as to occurrences on the day of the election, were filed with the supervisor, returning board, or clerk of district court. The registered vote of the parish was 1,004 white, 2,127 colored. No republican tickets were sent into or used in the parish, save perhaps one or two which were written. The republican party voluntarily abandoned the contest before the day of the election, and purposely withheld tickets from the parish. This was proven. The canvass was quiet, although the democrats worked with more energy and hope of success than at any time since 1868, when Seymour carried the parish by a majority of 767; the colored vote then, as now, being largely cast with the democrats. Notwithstanding the considerable colored majority, some democrats have been elected at almost every general election. This is true not only as to parish officers, such as clerk, sheriff, &c., but for parish judge, Legislature, &c.; this, too, over the regular nominees of the republican party. It required the co-operation of several hundred colored voters to accomplish this. It is no new thing for colored men, in large numbers, to vote the democratic ticket in this parish.

Rev. John A. Reiley, of the Presbyterian Church, a gentleman of large property, a most pronounced and outspoken republican, removed from New Jersey to this parish ten years ago. He voted for Hayes and Wheeler, but not for the electors, because there were no printed tickets, and he could not recall the names of the electors. Mr. Reiley was one of the republican commissioners of election at Clinton, the parish shire town. He testified as follows about the democratic parish ticket:

By Mr. NEW:

Question. You say you voted the democratic parish ticket, but you felt no particular zeal. How am I to understand you?

Answer. I mean what I say. I felt no particular zeal for a republican parish ticket. I voted very heartily for the candidates on the parish ticket because I was interested.

Q. Did you feel any considerable zeal for the democratic parish ticket?

A. Yes, sir; that is what I say.

Q. You did not vote the democratic parish ticket, then, because there was no republican ticket.

A. No, sir; they were the men of my choice; they were the men I had selected before the ticket was made up.

Q. You would not have voted a republican parish ticket if it had not had those names upon it?

A. If I had been making a republican parish ticket I would have put those same names upon it.

The democratic parish ticket being thus supported by leading white republicans, colored men were easily persuaded to give it their support. The result was that no republican parish ticket was nominated. This gave the democratic ticket, parish, State, and national, a strong send-off early in the canvass. The testimony clearly discloses the fact that there are quite a number of colored men in this parish who have always been democrats. In the past, there have been frequent and serious dissensions among the republicans, and the colored republicans have been very frequently voting a mixed ticket. It appears from the concurrent testimony of witnesses of both colors and both parties that there has been an increasing and loud complaint among the colored people about official corruption generally, but more especially about high taxes and misappropriation of the school funds. These had become and are such crying evils that every witness, colored and white, tells the same story and tells it with such look and emphasis as to leave no doubt that his feelings are intense on these subjects.

The democrats were not slow to discover the situation, and they went to work with a determination to win. This can be well understood when we consider what white and colored had already endured under radical misrule. Places were appointed for public speaking in every neighborhood. Democratic-conservative clubs were formed in every ward, and the original colored democrats were among the most active. They were posted and put forward. They, in fact, constituted the advance—organizing clubs and making speeches at the club meetings and elsewhere. They devoted their time almost exclusively to work. Old-fashioned barbecues were gotten up, addressed by speakers of both races. The colored people, men, women, and children, turned out in large number, and everything was done to make these occasions as attractive as possible. At the close of the canvass there were democratic-conservative clubs in every ward, the colored membership numbering in the aggregate eight hundred and sixty-three. The republicans seemed to have lost all hope early in the canvass. It may be that some colored men, upon going to the polls and finding no republican tickets, fell in with the current, thus swelling the democratic vote, who would have voted the republican ticket if their leaders had provided one.

It was proven that Anderson admitted upon several occasions that the election was fair, and he congratulated democrats upon their victory.

The nomination of General Nicholls for governor was favorably looked upon and received by the colored people as well as the white. The speech made by him when nominated was well spoken of and largely confided in by colored voters. He promised that if elected taxation should be and would be reduced; that the school money should be expended alone for school purposes; that every man who obeyed the law should be protected by the law; and that all violations of law should be punished by law, and not otherwise.

The colored people had always known that the intelligent white men of the parish were the best qualified to fill the offices and they also knew that the same class could but be interested in a wise administration of parochial and State affairs.

General Nicholls was in the parish early. There was great eagerness on the part of the colored people to see and hear him. He mingled with them freely, kindly greeting all, and giving especial attention in cases where it would do the most good. He addressed a very large meeting at Clinton. The colored people turned out almost en masse. They crowded around and upon the stand, paying the closest attention. They believed him to be a sincere, honest man, and hundreds of them then and there made up their minds to vote for him. This once resolved upon, the support of Tilden and Hendricks easily followed.

The canvass was conducted in the most orderly manner.

In this connection we wish to call attention to the testimony of Mr. J. W. Mann, a most estimable gentleman, and recognized as one of the best citizens in this parish. Mr. Mann is a large planter near Port Hudson. He is a Massachusetts man and a republican. (See testimony of subcommittee, page 301.)

There were no whippings at any time in this parish on account of politics, and during the canvass there were but two of which we could hear of any kind; one the case of Ezekiel Glover, who has said that it was not on account of politics, and the other Ananias Richardson, who entered the store-house of Rev. John A. Reiley, and, without permission, helped himself to meat out of the pork-barrel. All persons having property, without regard to party, were, it seems, foraged upon alike.

John Marston testified as follows:

Mr. Parson Reiley told me that he had lost most of his crop of 1874, and a good deal of the crop of 1875, by negroes stealing it, and that the regulators had saved his crop of 1876. That is the conversation I had with Mr. Reiley a short while ago. He was very much in favor of the regulators.

Rev. John A. Reilly was chairman of one of these lynching organizations, and assisted in organizing it. White men were regulated and run out of the parish for stealing. Jos. A. Norwood tells of one Robinson thus driven off, because he had stolen hogs from a colored man, and of one Brown compelled to leave the parish by the regulators on account of stealing cattle from a colored man.

As a specimen of the utter recklessness with which affidavits were prepared to order for use before the returning board, we invite attention to that of James Law, colored. In his affidavit he says:

I have heard of many instances of colored men in said parish having been whipped and shot for attending republican meetings.

When examined before the subcommittee he said he did not know of but one republican meeting being held in the parish, and had heard of but one case where blows were struck, and of no case where a colored man was shot for attending republican meetings.

Law shot a colored man a few years since at Port Hudson, in a political campaign. Law was a bolter at that time from the regular republican organization.

Z. S. Sparkman, (white,) before the returning board, said that in the summer of 1875 an armed body of men called him out of his house and told him they had heard that he was a radical, and that he must leave the parish within ten days; that, in the fall of 1875, the same men came to his house and took therefrom "his three young children by a colored woman, whom affiant was living with," and notified him that he must take them out of the parish. The proof, by the brother-in-law of Sparkman and others, is that he was living in adultery with a colored woman and had been for years; had three children by her, as he admits. It was determined to put a stop to his shameless conduct. His brother-in-law swears that he was one of the party who visited him; that he was not touched, but was very plainly informed that he must mend his ways in this regard; and that if he did not he must leave the parish. It was proven that Sparkman had always been a democrat, and that his affidavit before the returning board was the first intimation received by anybody that he had changed his political creed.

P. Charles Butler (white), says before returning board that he is a republican, and that no republican ticket was put up or voted for because of terror and intimidation. This is the same Butler already mentioned. It was proven that he had shot some twenty-three men, killing several of them; has shot at and wounded two men within the last six months. About two years ago, at a convention of his own party, not being satisfied with the proceedings, he commenced firing into the assembly, and before he finished he had lodged bullets in eight colored men.

Jared W. Harrell (white) says he was cursed for being a damned nigger-loving radical by men who came to his house armed with shotguns and threatened to hang him. Says, also, that they stripped his servant woman and whipped her almost to death. The proof is that he was and had been for a long time living in open and notorious adultery with this colored servant-woman. It had become the standard and stereotyped scandal of the community, and his own wife had sent word to some young men of the neighborhood that she wanted their intimacy broken up. They did not need a second invitation. Harrell had always been a democrat, and nothing to the contrary was ever heard until his affidavit was filed before the returning board.

The last man killed by Butler was George Hicks, a democrat, killed on the 18th of July, 1876, during the canvass.

He was in jail at Clinton when this subcommittee left there, having been arrested on account of his threat to kill some one. He says he is "a republican, and desired at the last election to be a candidate for sheriff, but did not run because he was told he would never be allowed to hold the office if elected."

The name of Thomas H. Jenks figures more prominently before the returning board as a witness against the white people of this parish than that of any other person. He says that Jerry Norman, colored, was shot at church by a band of regulators in August, 1875. The proof is that he was shot by one Eugene Thompson, white, at whom Norman had fired the day before, the ball entering a sack of meal upon which Thompson was sitting. It was an old feud, not involving politics, and the killing was not done at church, nor in the presence of but one person, a colored man, who testified before the committee. He also says that Dr. Wood passed sentence of death on two colored girls, and that the sentence was executed by one hundred armed men. The proof is that a party of colored men were in the act of hanging these girls, because they believed them to be guilty of stealing some clothing from a colored family, and Dr. Wood, hearing of it for the first time, hastened to the spot and saved their lives.

Mr. Jenks was well known to the tax-payers of this parish of both colors. T. A. Moore testified of him as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

Question. You live here?
Answer. Yes, sir; practice law.
Q. How long have you lived here?
A. Since 1867.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. I am a lawyer.
Q. Were you acquainted with Thomas H. Jenks?
A. I was.
Q. Did he ever live here?
A. Yes, sir; he came here as tax-collector. He came here in May or June, I think, as tax-collector under appointment from Governor Warmoth, and he remained until, I think, in April, 1871—somewhere in the neighborhood of two years.
Q. Do you know whether he got into any legal troubles as tax-collector?
A. There were same rumors around that he was a defaulter, and a few days afterward he disappeared, and then it was found that he was a defaulter to the State and parish of $20,000 in the suit of James Graham, auditor, for the benefit of the State and of the parish jury for the benefit of the parish; also crimnal proceedings against him.
Q. Were there any judgments rendered?
A. Yes, sir; one at the suit of the State, under the name of James Graham, auditor, for the benefit of the State of Louisiana, against Thomas H. Jencks, judgment for $10,322.22; and the case of the police jury against Thomas H. Jencks, judgment was rendered for $10,072 56, I think.
Q. What were the dates of these judgments?
A. The judgment in the case of the State was the 14th of January, 1872; and I think on the same day in favor of the parish.

The killing of John Gair and his sister-in-law, commonly called Babe Mathews, both colored, in October, 1875, are the cases most frequently mentioned in affidavits filed before the returning board. We examined with the utmost thoroughness these cases, and found that it conclusively appeared that politics was in no manner involved.

I believe that these excesses were the result of the bad government which bad men have given to the State of Louisiana. John Gair was killed in October, 1875, by a large party of men, numbering near one hundred. It was charged that at his instigation his sister-in-law attempted to poison Dr. J. W. Sanders, of Clinton. The sister-in-law was working at the house of Sanders as a house-servant. Sanders, after taking a drink of water, was sick, and the symptoms were pronounced to be those of arsenical poisoning. The girl was suspected and was accused of putting arsenic in the water, and she confessed that such was the fact. She made affidavit as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of East Feliciana:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, Catherine Mathews, (colored,) who, being duly sworn, doth depose and say: About one week ago, or more, she was in the town of Baton Rouge, on a visit to her sister, the wife of John Gair; that while there a young colored man by the name of John George, who formerly resided in this parish, gave her some poison in a small vial and requested her to poison Dr. Sanders, saying that John George told her it was a made-up thing between her brother-in-law, John Gair, and Bob Ray to use the poison to poison and to kill Dr. Sanders; that he told her to put it in the water for him; that she used said poison as directed, and that she is sorry for what she has done; that she committed the act because John George told her that Gair and Ray wanted her to do it.

Sworn to this 11th day of October, 1875.

CATHERINE MATHEWS.

(Written in her own handwriting.)
Sworn to and subscribed before me this 11th day of October, 1875, and signed.

T. B. LYONS,
Parish Judge.

I do not believe that the killing of Gair was because of his being a republican. He had removed from the parish of East Feliciana, and was killed at a time when there was no political excitement whatever, nor had there been for twelve months.

There was no evidence of his ever having had any personal difficulty growing out of politics with any white man. There is no evidence that he had been in the parish after his removal.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that in the absence of a republican ticket some colored republicans were prevailed upon, against their own inclinations, to vote the democratic ticket. It is not difficult to see how this might be true in any community where one party had abandoned the field at the beginning, and when the other was therefore having it all its own way. It would not be remarkable if under such circumstances some votes were secured by the prevailing party against the secret desire and choice of persons voting.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that Captain Rogers, of the United States Army, a republican, stationed in this parish, gives it as his best judgment that about two-thirds of the colored vote, if uninfluenced by others, would be cast for the republican party. The registered democratic vote is placed in Sherman's report at 1,004 and the republican vote at 2,127. Subtract from the latter number two-thirds of the same, and there would remain 709 colored votes which would be democratic. This added to the democratic registered vote would make 1,713 votes, which is within 23 votes of the number cast for the democratic electors. It will be seen, therefore, that the democratic vote is not any larger than it would be entitled to on a full vote. This cannot be denied, for in addition to the 1,736 votes cast for the democratic candidates, there were 443 democratic votes cast at a side ballot-box by persons who had failed to register. But these votes are not included in the 1,736. If the republican party permitted the election to go by default, they cannot justly complain.

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that in these three parishes alone Mr. Tilden, by the action of the returning board and its ratification by a majority of the electoral commission, has been robbed of a valid majority of 2,819, which is within 618 votes of the majority given by the board and commission to Mr. Hayes in the State.

The investigations by the other subcommittees show that a majority of not less than 4,820 in favor of Mr. Tilden was taken from him without right and in gross disregard and violation of law in the other parishes in which votes were thrown out.

THE SEWING-MACHINE CIRCULAR SWINDLE.

By the sewing-machine circular swindle at least twenty-five hundred democratic voters in the city of New Orleans were disfranchised.

The New Orleans subcommittee make the following statement upon this subject:

In this connection we call attention to what is known as the "sewing-machine circular" swindle, the details of which are fully given in the evidence, and which reveal a vile plot to deprive thousands of citizens of New Orleans of their votes at the election. About twenty-nine thousand of these sewing-machine circulars were sent by mail-carriers to registered white voters who were supposed to be democrats, directed to their places of registration, the carriers being instructed if the persons to whom they were addressed were not found at the places designated, which they did without making much inquiry, that they should be returned. These circulars were then placed in the hands of two metropolitan policemen, who purported to go to the same places and inquire for the person registered. The inquiries were either not made or done so carelessly as to prevent the delivery of the letters. The policemen then made information against all those they did not find before United States officials, and warrants were issued against about eleven thousand persons for false registry, thousands of which were returned "not found." After these warrants had been thus returned, at the instance of a republican official, on the Saturday night preceding the election, all the supervisors of registration were called into the custom-house, and during that night and on the succeeding Sabbath some thousands of those names were stricken from the list of registered voters.

As soon as this fraud was discovered, the persons against whom the false charges were made voluntarily appeared before W. Southworth, United States commissioner, who proceeded to hear the parties, disposing of the cases at the rate of one every two minutes. In over thirteen hundred cases he only found five which he continued for further hearing. The residue of the cases yet remain undisposed of; Mr. Jewett, the other commissioner, who was one of the prime movers in the plot, refusing to index the cases, thereby preventing the parties charged before him from having a hearing. The warrants were turned over to the supervisors, in order that they might strike the names from their lists of registration. By this conspiracy a large number of democratic voters, estimated at not less than 2,500, among them persons who were born and had resided there all their lives on the spot from which they registered, were deprived of their right of suffrage.

It is a fact of significance that the minority report signed by the republican members of the Louisiana committee makes no allusion whatever to this fraud, notwithstanding its notoriety.

Mr. Speaker, upon the face of the proceedings of the returning board it is clear that its action was fraudulent. The refusal to fill the vacancy with a democrat, as the law required, ought to and will convince honest men that wrong was resolved upon. It was not intended that there should be a fifth member who would be present at their secret meetings and would expose unlawful conspiracy and corrupt action.

The testimony of Picket, Maddox, Kenedy, Kenner, and others before the committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House in counting the electoral vote establish the fact that the returning board through its president, Wells, was ready up to the last moment before the final finding to count the State for Mr. Tilden for a moneyed consideration.

After the effort which has been made in what is known to the country as the "Sherman report," to whitewash the character of the returning board, it may be of interest as well as instructive to hear what General Phil. Sheridan has to say about Wells. In an official report he says:

Wells's conduct as governor has been notoriously corrupt. He had illegally appointed a board of levee commissioners, who were authorized to hold over by an act of the Legislature, and a conflict of authority ensued, and in the mean time the Mississippi overflowed and great damage was done to property. There was an appropriation of $4,000,000 made by the Legislature for repairs of the levees, and Wells wanted to finger some of this money.

In a letter to Secretary Stanton of date June 3, 1867, explaining his action in removing Wells, General Sheridan said:

After the adjournment of the Legislature the governor of the State appointed a board of his own in violation of this act, and made the acknowledgment in person that his object was to disburse the money in the interest of his own party by securing for it the vote of the employés at the time of the election. The board continued in office, but the Legislature refused to turn over to the governor's board, and each side appealed to me to sustain it, which I would not do. The question must then have gone to the courts, which, according to the governor's judgment when he was appealing to me to be sustained, would require one year for decision. Meantime the State was overflowed. The levee boards were tied up by political chicanery, and nothing was done to relieve the poor people, now fed by the charity of the Government and charitable associations of the North. I say now, unequivocally, that Governor Wells is a political trickster and a dishonest man. I have seen him myself, when I first came to this command, turn out all of the Union men who had supported the Government, and put in their stead rebel soldiers, some of whom had not yet dropped their gray uniform. I have seen him again, during the July riot of 1866, skulk away where I could not find him to give him a guard, instead of coming out as a manly representative of the State and joining those who were preserving the peace. I have watched him since, and his conduct has been sinuous as the mark left in the dust by the movement of a snake. I say again that he is dishonest, and dishonesty is more than must be expected of me.

In a letter to General Grant about the removal of Wells, General Sheridan said:

He has embarrassed me very much since I came into command by his subterfuge and political chicanery. This necessary act will be approved by every class and shade of political opinion here. HE HAS NOT ONE FRIEND WHO IS AN HONEST MAN.

If anything can be wanting to demonstrate beyond the shadow of doubt that the returning board has been guilty of the most willful and wanton misconduct and fraud, it will be supplied by the following facts:

The members of the returning board have sworn that they did not know the result of the election for electors, as shown upon the face of the returns made to them, nor how the canvass and compilation made by them would affect the result until their work was concluded. And yet, three days prior to the completion of their false and fraudulent compilation, United States Marshal Pitkin telegraphed as follows to Senator WEST:

NEW ORLEANS, December 3, 1876.

Hon. J. R. WEST, Washington, D. C.:

Democratic boast entire fallacy. Have northern friends on way North. Answer telegram of this morning; also, have Senate anticipate House on sending committee to investigate outrages. Have seen Wells, who says: "Board will return Hayes, sure. Have no fear."

J. R. G. PITKIN.

Pitkin swears that he obtained this information from Wells.

The republican party is not only unwilling to see colored men vote the democratic ticket, but by its conduct asserts that if the colored voter is so unmindful of his obligation to that party as to vote the democratic ticket his ballot shall not be counted.

In the Sherman report it is asserted that if the "blacks" were left free to vote without violence or intimidation they would be almost unanimously republican. This statement assumes as true the very question in controversy.

Mr. Speaker, I know, and the colored men of Louisiana and other States North and South know, that the republican party has treated the color of a certain class of American citizens as a mark bearing testimony that those persons belonged to the republican party, notwithstanding the fact they had been liberated from slavery.

Why may not colored men vote the democratic ticket in Louisiana as well as in all the other Southern States? Has not the inducement to so vote been stronger there than in any of the other Southern States because of the accursed State government by which all classes and colors have been oppressed and robbed?

It is well known that thousands of colored men of their own free will voted the democratic ticket in Arkansas, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, and South Carolina. In no other way can the large democratic vote in those States be accounted for. No man of average political information will deny this.

Mr. Speaker, it was no new thing for colored men in the South to vote the democratic ticket at the late election. Two years ago, in more localities than one in the South, colored men marched in democratic processions of their own organizing, bearing in their hands democratic banners and democratic ballots. We heard upon the floor of this House at the last session a telegram read which had just been received by a southern democratic member from a colored constituent, urging him to attend a colored democratic barbecue to be held soon thereafter.

Sir, the time is coming, and is not very distant, when the colored vote all over the country will be divided about equally between the dominant parties. When that time arrives a riot at Hamburgh or at Vicksburgh will not be talked of in Congress or before the country for political effect. There is no good reason why there should in the future be any ill-feelling or estrangement between the people of the North and South. We have some men in the North who will not believe that the war is over, and never will; so we had just as well let them go on with their war of words.

It was General Scott, I believe, who said that when our civil war should be over, and the opposing combatants had laid aside their arms and were ready to live together in peace in a restored Union, it would require all the good sense and patriotism of the country to keep the non-combatants from tearing each others' eyes out.

Mr. Speaker, thank God the hated and hellish battle-cry of sectional hate, so long sounded in the ears of the people by ambitious and wicked demagogues, will not longer be listened to with patience by decent men of any party or color.

And, sir, notwithstanding the bitter disappointment which recent events have brought to the democratic party I do not believe it will lose faith in our democratic system of government, nor be guilty of any act tending or looking toward its dissolution or impairment.

For one, sir, I look, with a confidence scarcely less assuring than a realization of the fact, to such an uprising of the people four years hence in retribution and condemnation of the great wrong and crime just accomplished as will forever attest the fact that the American people not only have unabated confidence in the patriotism of the democratic party, but intend that the future administration of the Government shall be intrusted to those only who are the choice of the people as expressed at the ballot-box.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. J. SPARKS,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1877,

On the bill to provide for counting the electoral vote.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, the pending report of the joint committee of the two Houses, with the accompanying bill now under consideration, has to some extent deranged the order of discussion that I had proposed on the resolutions reported by the select committee of the House on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. But I hope the patience of the House will not be exhausted while, directing my remarks to the bill now before us and under this changed aspect of the case, I briefly express the views entertained by me on the subjects involved in this discussion.

The proposition that the President of the Senate by the terms of the Constitution, or by any fair implication derived from that instrument, is clothed with the power to count, adjudge, and determine the electoral vote, or to pass upon the certificates purporting to contain that vote, with the varied and momentous questions that necessarily arise therefrom, (except to open said certificates in the presence of the two Houses, as expressly provided in the Constitution,) seems to me so utterly fallacious and absurd that it would under ordinary circumstances hardly call for serious consideration.

Yet a respectable number of the eminent leaders of a strong and now dominant political party, have assumed this attitude; and therefore acting under my convictions it becomes a duty not only publicly to record my dissent from this position but in as forcible words as I may be able to command give the reasons upon which that dissent is founded.

The proposition as it strikes me, sir, is not only wrong as a mere question of constitutional construction, but is opposed to and at war with the spirit of republican institutions.

The fundamental principle that underlies our institutions is, that the people have and of right ought to exercise the sovereign power. Any effort then to repose undue authority in the hands of one individual is a substantial and dangerous departure from that general rule. I do not hesitate to say that the man believing in and revereing free institutions does not exist who, with the lights we now have before us, were he engaged in framing a constitution for our future government, would for one moment tolerate the proposition of reposing in any one man the power claimed by these gentlemen now to exist in the President of the Senate, for the reason that it is in opposition to all of our theories of republican government in this, that it deprives the people and their Representatives of all authority in determining the most vital question as to the result of that people's own action and reposes absolute power in the hands of a single man who is irresponsible to them for its legitimate and proper exercise.

The fallacy and monstrous wrong of the proposition will be more apparent when we consider that in certain contingencies which may arise under the Constitution, any ambitious, bad man being the President of the Senate and a candidate for the Presidency would, without regard to justice or popular liberty, have the the power, in determining a case in which he was a most deeply interested party, by his own act, to elect and clothe himself with the chief executive authority of the Republic. Such contingencies have already six times occurred during the eighty-eight years of our national existence under the Constitution.

I belong to that order of men, Mr. Speaker, who believe in the capacity of mankind to govern themselves; who believe that all the triumphs of civilization, and the conquests of democratic principles in the past have been solely attributable to the wisdom and aggregate action of the people! History it appears to me has been studied with little purpose if the student fails to understand that every great era of the world's history representing advancing civilization and advancing freedom (for they have ever gone hand in hand) was the result of the struggling masses against the despotic few.

Therefore the assertion that one man in this democratic country and under our republican form of government should have the power reposed in him of determining by his own arbitrary, unappealable, and unrepealable act the final result of the sovereign will of the people when exercising their highest functions of sovereign authority, the election of their Chief Magistrate, is not only untenable, but, in my judgment, absolutely absurd. And when, as I have before intimated, that man may under the Constitution be a candidate for the Presidency himself, and therefore a deeply interested party as to the determination and result of the election, it stamps such a proposition as monstrous and utterly indefensible.

Let me state a situation not impossible. Suppose an election has been held as now; that the political views of the President of the Senate were unknown; that his lips had been sealed, and that none of us in either branch of Congress knew his leanings. Suppose a tie in the Senate and total inability to elect a new presiding officer, and let it be understood that each of the contending parties honestly believe that their candidate was duly elected, is there a man on earth believes that one of us in either House would for an instant think of reposing the power of determining the count and the momentous and grave issues connected with and surrounding it to the final determination and arbitrament of that single man?

Or, further to elaborate this idea, suppose all the people were assembled, nearly or quite equally divided into two parties, and each party firmly believing that their candidate was elected, and one man, whose views were unknown, was President of the Senate, and it should be submitted to them whether or not the grave question of determining the serious and weighty interests involved should be left solely to him, do we not all feel that such a proposition would be treated by all parties with derision and contempt, and that the natural promptings of popular sovereignty would find expression in unmistakable denunciations of a solution of their difficulty by a resort to an expedient so nearly allied to despotic rule and so dangerous to the theories of popular liberty?

The foregoing views, Mr. Speaker, are, it seems to me, clearly sustained by the spirit if not by the letter of the Constitution, for I claim, sir, that in the execution of all powers not defined by it it is its spirit that those nearest the people, their representatives, should when necessity exists be the authors of the execution of these undefined powers necessary to government.

The tenth amendment of the Constitution declares that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Now, while the power reserved in this article as applicable to the present situation, strictly construed, may make a further amendment to the Constitution the only expedient for the expression of the popular will, yet the spirit of this amendment is in conformity to the views heretofore expressed by me, and clearly opposed to the assumption of authority by the gentlemen who entertain the view that the President of the Senate should count the electoral votes.

The necessity for the tenth amendment proceeded from the fact that reactionary and centralizing theories of government were at the time of its adoption advocated by the Federal party, and our fathers of democratic faith, apprehensive of dangerous encroachments on popular liberty, insisted upon and secured its incorporation into the Constitution.

The provisions of the Constitution under which this power is claimed are in the twelfth amendment, so often quoted, and are in the following words:

> They [the electors] shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The first clause, it is admitted, simply makes the President of the Senate the custodian of the returns until the time for the final count.

Now, the power or authority conferred upon him by the second clause must necessarily be our only inquiry, for the above provisions contain the only mention or allusion in the Constitution or amendments to the President of the Senate with respect to the electoral vote.

Does it mean that he shall count the vote? If this be so, to use a familiar expression, "Why in the name of common sense don't it say so?" It would take less words to do it, and it is a fact worthy of mention that the patriotic and eminent men who framed the Constitution, from which this clause of the amendment is copied, were sparing of words.

If they had intended that the President of the Senate should not only open the certificates but also count the votes, they could have expressly conferred upon him that power by the use of five words, while they in fact used seven to raise an implication of power in him to do it as contended for by these gentlemen.

Let us analyze it. Suppose it said "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and then count the votes." This would certainly confer the express power upon him by the use of the last five words. But the language is:

> The President of the Senate shall in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Using seven words in the conclusion, and clearly relieving it from any express authority in him to count; and, as it seems to me, raising no implication of such authority, for it has been unanswerably asserted by eminent authority that implied powers are those only which are necessary to the execution of those expressly conferred, and there being none thus conferred by this clause of the Constitution there can be no implied powers deducible from it to sustain the theory of the power in the President of the Senate to count, as insisted upon by the defenders of that theory.

But it must also be borne in mind, that it is not only the power numerically to count that is asserted to be in him; but necessarily the power judicially to determine the legality of the electoral votes in the case of fraudulent, illegal, or double returns and; it is this judicial determination that attaches to the subject the gravity and vast responsibility that I have argued is so dangerous to be intrusted to the caprice of one irresponsible official—so repugnant to the genius of our institutions, and having no warrant or authority in the Constitution.

But the votes are to be counted; and if not by the President of the Senate, by whom, and how?

There is no express authority in the premises delegated or conferred upon anybody. It is therefore, in my judgment, a power clearly reserved to the people, as expressed in the tenth amendment to the Constitution; and that being so, it can hardly be doubted, taking that amendment in connection with the last-quoted clause of the twelfth article of the amendments, that the only proper tribunal for the determination of the question and settling the plan for its solution must rest with the representatives of the people in the two Houses of Congress, for, to execute this necessary power, not expressed, and therefore reserved, must devolve legitimately upon them or the Government is a failure.

The power to determine the questions in regard to disputed electoral votes cannot in the nature of things rest with the States, for the Constitution provides that the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress and that the votes shall then be counted. The States, having parted with them, cannot count or share in the counting. That duty therefore must devolve upon the people, and is to be executed by their representatives in both Houses of the National Legislature in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, and necessarily in such mode or manner as will most orderly and efficiently accomplish that object.

And by a fair interpretation of these constitutional provisions, as it seems to me, the end to be attained can only be by the concurrent action of the two Houses affirmatively directed to its accomplishment. For if the power to determine this question is, as I assume, reserved to the people, the legitimate expression of that power is, beyond question, in their representatives in both Houses of Congress, and requires not only their affirmative but concurrent action by legislative enactment, joint rule, or some similar mode. And in the absence of these the counting of any electoral vote objected to by either House is, under any contingency, an impossibility.

Now, sir, I have presented the views that occur to me in opposition to the pretended power in the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote:

First. By reasons against it deducible from the nature and theory of our form of government;

Second. By arguments based upon the language of the clauses of the Constitution relating to that subject; and,

Third. Have insisted that the power not being delegated is reserved to the people, and by them is to be executed through their Representatives in Congress; and I have expressed the manner through which this to be done. And now, as a last proposition, I shall insist that these views of the question are in harmony with those of the eminent men of the country and are sustained by acts and precedents established from the beginning of presidential counts to the present.

The first presidential count under a fully organized system was in 1793, in which the two Houses appointed a joint "committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President," &c. The committee reported, fixing the time, place of meeting, and manner of counting the votes by three tellers, one on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House, appointed by the Houses respectively. And these tellers, members of and as agents of the two Houses, received the lists when opened, "examined them," and from them, under the direction of the Houses, made up the state of the vote, which done, the Vice-President, from the statement thus made and handed to him by the tellers, "announced the vote," &c.

The same kind of proceedings were had with respect to the count in 1797 and 1801, most clearly showing the exercise of authority over the counts to have been in the two Houses. In neither of these cases was there any conflict nor occasion for anything beyond the formal counting of the votes; but they show that that was recognized as the proper prerogative of the two Houses and executed as such, and it is a notable fact that immediately following the count of 1801, on account of the Jefferson-Burr imbroglio, it was found necessary to amend the Constitution, under which amendment all counts since then have been made; and it will be found that this clause of the twelfth amendment, under which this claim of the President of the Senate's power to count is derived, was literally copied from the original clause of the Constitution. Now, what are we to learn by this? Our fathers had most clearly for over twelve years acted upon the assumption that the power to count was not in the President of the Senate, but in the Houses, and so clear and well understood was it that when they amended the Constitution this clause was simply copied without alteration.

On examination it will be found that every count of a presidential vote from that time (1793) up to 1865 has been conducted in the same manner, the two Houses on every occasion appointing "joint committees to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President," &c., committees reporting "time, place, and mode of counting," and the Houses appointing tellers to do it under their direction, &c.

During this time there were very few conflicts; indeed, none of a serious character. The first was on the first election of Mr. Monroe, in 1817, and occurred in regard to counting the vote of the new State of Indiana, with respect to which a doubt existed as to whether or not it was a State in the Union, duly admitted under the Constitution and laws. From the proceedings that took place on that occasion it will be clearly seen that the President of the Senate did not assume to determine the question of doubt with respect to the count or to exercise any authority in the premises, further than to open the certificates and after the count to announce the state of the vote, and that the Houses did assume that authority, and did consider the questions involved, and determined them to their own satisfaction and that of the country.

The next was on the second election of Mr. Monroe, in 1821, and occurred in regard to counting the vote of the new State of Missouri, which was in most respects identical with that of Indiana in 1817. The question of the admissibility of its vote was quite fully discussed by the members of both Houses, and by them determined in favor of counting the votes alternatively, namely: The total number of votes cast was declared to be "232, including the vote of Missouri, of which 117 make a majority, or, excluding the vote of Missouri, 229, of which 115 make a majority, but in either event James Monroe was elected President and Daniel D. Tompkins Vice-President;" which, having been determined by the two Houses through their tellers and after discussion of the matter by the members, was announced by the President of the Senate as the state of the vote, but he in no sense taking any part in the discussion or determination of the question and being utterly ignored by the Houses as a party to be consulted in the matter, they assuming all and he none of the authority in the premises.

The next was on the election of Mr. Van Buren, in 1837, in regard to counting the vote of the State of Michigan, which was similar to that of Missouri and treated in all respects the same as that State was in 1821, the votes thereof by direction and determination of the Houses being counted in the alternative, as it produced no practical effect upon the result of the election.

The next was on the election of Mr. Buchanan, in 1857, and occurred over the count of the vote of the State of Wisconsin, the electors of which had met and cast the electoral vote of that State on the day succeeding that prescribed by law, being prevented from meeting on the right day on account of a violent snow-storm which prevailed in that State, so that the electors did not reach the capitol in time to cast the vote on the day prescribed but performed that duty on the following day. Over this a long and very interesting discussion occurred, conducted by the able and eminent statesmen who then composed the two Houses of Congress, and which will repay the reader a careful perusal. It all ended in the vote of the State being counted, but done according to their determination and direction, the President of the Senate explicitly disclaiming any authority or control over it.

The count of 1861, when Mr. Lincoln was first elected, was made upon the threshold of a mighty revolution, when the Senate was presided over by Mr. Breckinridge, himself a candidate for the Presidency and ardently sympathizing with those who were then inaugurating rebellion. Had he and his compeers conceived the idea that he was clothed with this vast power, with the great inducements to its exercise in his own interest and for the interest of those with whom he was in affiliation, what might he not have done to cripple the Union and advance the confederate cause? That he, with such inducements, refused to claim or exercise the power now claimed by these gentlemen to exist in the President of the Senate argues not only how indefensible the claim was then considered, but does great honor to the memory of a great man.

And now, sir, we come to the electoral count of 1865. It will be observed that from the organization of the Government up to this period the two Houses have on each and every occasion by joint rule established the mode and manner of counting the vote under the Constitution. But to obviate the necessity of a specific joint rule for each occasion they now adopt a general rule for their future guidance, known as the twenty-second joint rule, and is as follows:

The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses thus assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates. And the votes having been counted the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and together with a list of the votes be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

If upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision. And no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses; which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately re-assemble, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted. And upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

At such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the "Speaker's chair;" for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; for the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any of such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock p. m.

Now, this rule was established by the two Houses of Congress at a time when they were composed almost exclusively of republican members, there being scarcely enough democrats in either House to be called an opposition party, and it was adopted by a unanimous vote, and that vote given mainly, so far as the Senate is concerned, by the identical Senators now repudiating it and insisting that the power to count is in the President of the Senate. It was not adopted as a make-shift, a compromise, or a present expedient—for there was no occasion for any of these—but as a permanent rule jointly established by the two Houses to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution that authorized the count. They certainly will not insist that it was an expedient not warranted by the Constitution, nor a rule outside of or beyond the Constitution. To do so would make them triflers with their oaths of office. It purported to be the joint rule made by them, prescribing the mode and manner and for the purpose of giving orderly and efficient effect to the constitutional provisions in relation to counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to obviate the necessity of making quadrennial rules, as had been done prior to its establishment, and for no other purpose, and as such was treated by them and received by the country at large.

Under it the electoral votes of 1865, 1869, and 1873 were determined and counted, and the Presidents and Vice-Presidents thus counted in were inaugurated. It has done its work well for twelve years and has thus long been regarded as the faithful interpreter of the Constitution with respect to electoral counts. And now, when the country is convulsed with the calamity of a disputed election, why could it not continue as the peaceful guide to lead us out of this political wilderness and restore peace and contentment to the country? My opinion is—and I cannot doubt that it is the opinion of the honest masses of the country—that it is opposed now as a rule because its provisions afford a solution of the present dispute not only in keeping with the votes of the people but in dislodging from power a party whose leaders were its authors and but a short time ago its zealous advocates.

Mr. Speaker, the pending bill does not as an abstract proposition commend itself to the approval of my judgment.

It seems to me a measure forced upon us by the complications thrown into this contest by the unscrupulous leaders of a hitherto dominant party who are unwilling to submit to the honest verdict of the people at the ballot-box.

I do not doubt and do not believe there is a doubt in the minds of the great majority of the people of the Union that the eminent and distinguished gentlemen representing the democratic party in the recent election were honestly and fairly elected by a majority of the electors appointed, (and it is admitted that they have a quarter of a million majority of the popular vote.) But the party now in power, reluctant to yield the trusts and lucrative offices so long held by them, and presuming upon the further patience of a forbearing people whose confidence they have so often betrayed, have, through the instrumentality of villainous returning boards, composed of unscrupulous, characterless scoundrels, and through the manipulations of scheming political tricksters, to whom patriotism and fair dealing are unknown and with whom success achieved by fraud is coveted, all aided by the military arm of the Government and the countenance and support of those high in authority, so complicated the case that many honest men doubt the result and we find the country exposed to the dangers of a civil conflict.

Under this state of the case this bill is presented. It will most probably pass the two Houses, be approved, and become a law. If so we are assured of a peaceful solution of the difficulties surrounding us. Paralyzed industries will be restored and the country move on in its pathways of peace and prosperity. And may we not also hope that the "electoral commissioners," to whom the adjudication of disputed electoral votes is submitted under the provisions of the bill will have the strength to rise above the influences of partisan prejudices, and, controlled solely by patriotic impulses, discharge the high trusts devolved upon them with fidelity to the Constitution and laws, and in the interests of the millions of their fellow-citizens.

With this view of it and this hope the bill shall have my support. As I have before stated it will probably pass. The gentlemen entertaining political sentiments in harmony with my own will, with great unanimity as I am advised, support it in both branches of Congress. If it is defeated therefore it will be done by the representatives of the opposite party, who were defeated at the polls by a popular majority of a quarter of a million of votes; and upon that party must rest the responsibility and fearful consequences.

Sir, I know the people, and know that they want peace. In peace and in the paths of peaceful pursuits lie their happiness and prosperity. And they know it, but they will not forfeit their manhood and sacrifice their constitutional liberties for a peace imposed by the extortion from them of their dearest rights.

Treat them with contempt; taunt them with the insinuation of a decaying manhood; spurn their sovereign authority expressed at the ballot-box; and my word for it they will resent the indignity and meet the grave issues thus thrust upon them with a terrible earnestness.

Commercial Relations with the Dominion of Canada and the Extension of Markets for our Productions.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH WARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1877,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) providing for the appointment of commissioners to confer with similar commissioners appointed by Great Britain and ascertain on what basis a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce between the United States and Canada can be negotiated.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, to those who regard our commercial relations with Canada comprehensively and in a national spirit, without undue bias from minor matters of merely local or special interest, it is sufficient for me to point out the respective geographical positions of the United States and the Dominion, and the extent of the latter country. A straight line drawn from the northern boundary of Maine, near the headwaters of the Saint John's River, to Detroit, would pass entirely through Canadian territory. We are enabled more clearly to estimate the extent of this line, which is small in comparison with our northern frontier, when we see, as we may on reference to any map of this continent, that if continued for the same length onward from Detroit into the United States, it would reach a considerable distance southerly from the place where the Arkansas River flows into the Mississippi, and that if extended directly south from Detroit it would reach nearly to Tallahassee or the Gulf of Mexico.

Regarded from another point of view, it may be seen that the part of the Canadian territory south of a line drawn from the northern boundaries of Maine and Minnesota would exceed in breadth the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, and would be equal in area not only to those States, but in addition to large portions of Nebraska, Missouri, Kentucky, Kansas, and Arkansas. A country of these vast dimensions, and under alien commercial laws, exists between all the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, on one side, and Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and all the region west of them on the other. An equal area extended southerly would, with the exception of a few miles, separate by a broad barrier all our territory north and east of any point on the northern shore of the Gulf of Mexico from all those parts of the Union which are northwest of it. What commercial advantages would not each State lose if Georgia, the Carolinas, Virginia, and Pennsylvania were thus widely separated from Mississippi, Missouri, and all that part of the United States west of them, and deprived of full and free commercial intercourse with the intervening region? The country thus separating these various States, if commercially isolated as far as Canada now is, would not only cease to be so vast a source of permanent and honorable profit to the other parts of the Union, but would itself, by its isolation, suffer in a greater proportion than the others. Such is the mutual injury continually inflicted on the people of both countries by the obstacles to the free exchange of the products of industry in the United States and Canada. Its bad effects would be more conspicuous than those of the imaginary condition I have endeavored to describe if the benefits of untrammeled commercial intercourse had ever been enjoyed. If to that part of Canada which alone I have brought under consideration we add the important maritime provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and Manitoba and the immense territory of the northwest interior, and on the Pacific coast, the loss mutually sustained is seen to be yet more vast and to be continually increasing.

NATURAL INTERDEPENDENCE OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Many considerations demonstrate the importance of the freest possible imports, exports, and transit between the United States and Canada. Not only does our warmer climate enable us to produce many articles not easily or profitably grown in Canada, yet necessary for the comfort of her people and for which she can give us valuable exchanges needed in the daily life of our citizens and as material for the manufactures we export, but our rivers, railroads, and canals are the only direct means she has of communicating with southern regions, while unfettered transit through her territory and the perpetually free navigation of the Saint Lawrence are conspicuous wants of the Western and Eastern States. The people of Canada, sprung from the same nations of western Europe as those whence we derive our origin, have all the characteristics of a commercial, enterprising, and progressive nation, however its manifestations may have been retarded by isolation from the remainder of the continent, and, favored by the resources of a new and broad territory, their products and exports are of greater value than those of a population of equal number but of any other race in the world. Already, though with inhabitants numbering less than one-twentieth part of those of Russia, Canada, yet a colony or possession of Great Britain, occupies the fourth if not the third rank among the nations of the world in the magnitude of her commercial marine. In the general education of the people modern Canada is unsurpassed. Separated as they are by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans from the nations of the Old World and enjoying the yet slightly developed advantages of their country, their rates of the wages of labor are on the whole not widely different from our own. From the greater part of the Canadian settlements, and at an average cost not far if at all exceeding that of the wages of an artisan for a single day, a man may come to the United States where he can earn such wages as are paid here and enjoy the advantages of republican institutions. In addition to these considerations, Canada is on the whole a forest and farming country, ready not only to sell us many of the bulky articles we need for common use or for exportation but also to receive in return those manufactures of which under the policy we have adopted we have a large surplus, and for which we have not yet found sufficient markets.

It has followed as a matter of course, from the relative positions of the United States and Canada and the distance of both from Europe and Asia with their dense populations, that their commercial relations have engaged the attention of the most sagacious statesmen and merchants of our country from the beginning of its history to the present time; and the advocates of the most liberal and intimate system of exchanges with the Canadians have been confined to no party, but have included in their number protectionists as well as free-traders. The advantages which, under a system of just and fair reciprocity, our own citizens and the people of the Dominion would mutually give and receive are at least, in proportion to their respective populations, as valuable as those which any States or groups of States confer upon each other by the unlimited freedom of trade between them, and these benefits are among the greatest derived from the Union and are the strongest bond for its preservation and perpetuity. The barriers to intercourse between our citizens and the Canadians are wholly artificial, the results of human law, and can easily be removed by mutual agreement and appropriate legislation.

HOW TRADE WITH CANADA IS REGARDED.

During the last twelve months the chief commercial bodies throughout the Northern States have passed resolutions earnestly in favor of the motion now before this House for the appointment of commissioners by the United States and on the part of Canada, through Great Britain, to inquire and ascertain by mutual investigation and conference how far it is practicable to extend our commerce with the Dominion.

In the States upon our northern frontier the advantages of an extension of our trade with Canada are, with perhaps a few local exceptions, highly appreciated by all thinking commercial men. A more complete system of the exchange of the products of labor between the two countries is warmly desired by the people of New England at large—a sufficient proof that it would not injure our manufactures, but would inure to their benefit. The close contiguity of New England on her northern and eastern boundaries to Canada gives her people ample opportunities for judging accurately as to the practical effect of reciprocal trade; and the intelligence and habits of shrewd and careful calculation prevalent in New England give assurance that her chief men of business are reliable authorities on this subject. Their views, as presented by one of the leading members of the Boston Board of Trade and in substance applicable to nearly all the Northern States, are unequivocally that New England is greatly interested in the question of reciprocity. Her people depend largely for their success and subsistence upon being able to manufacture as cheaply as they can. They think, and none can contradict them, that the prime necessities of life, fuel and food, should be supplied to their laboring-men at the lowest practicable cost.

IN NEW ENGLAND.

The citizens of New England, knowing that between them and the Canadians there are no barriers except those of an artificial nature, regard their neighbors in the provinces as their natural or legitimate customers. The representatives of the Boston Board of Trade assert that the people of Massachusetts are deeply impressed, as many others are in all parts of our country, with the fact that difficulties and depreciation are besetting every branch of industry. These formidable disasters are not confined to their great cities, but even in the small manufacturing towns also are found people seeking for work, and the general cry is, "It is our trade relations that are wrong and unsound; what have you to suggest to lift us out of this slough of despond?" The most obvious remedy for all this distress is to increase the sales of manufactures to our neighbors and the supply of raw materials from them.

IN NEW YORK.

The chief commercial associations in the city and State of New York substantially and emphatically concur in the views presented by the board of trade. The people of that State, like those of every other commercial and manufacturing part of the Union, suffer by the exclusion of Canadian products from our markets and the restrictions upon the exportation of our manufactured articles of foreign origin to Canada. Through duties on Canadian grain, we cut off an enormous trade which would naturally and with mutual benefit to the people of both countries pass through our territory, paying freight to owners of our railroads and canals and giving work and wages to vast multitudes of men now in need, and adding to the profits of our shippers and merchants, besides, through increased employment, enlarging the demand for the agricultural and other products of the regions through which they pass. What in these respects is true of the city and State of New York is also true of Philadelphia and Baltimore and the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. The latter, more remote from Canada, have not so clearly perceived the advantages of being enabled, with fewer or diminished impediments, to sell to her the products of their workshops or their imports from Europe and the regions of the tropics. Railroads, now giving such easy access from Baltimore and Philadelphia to the interior of the continent, have placed within their reach new advantages as regards trade with Canada which they do not yet adequately appreciate but are already of much importance and will continue to increase for centuries to come.

It is not surprising that the merchants and manufacturers of New England estimate at its real importance an extension of trade with Canada, a country not only contiguous to their own for many hundreds of miles, but for a considerable distance intervening between their territory and the ocean, and so near to them that a man may stand with one foot on each side of the dividing line. Yet as Canada is no mere eastern province, but extends across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and the best and most fertile parts of the Dominion are in the interior, her trade is no more important to New England than to any other part of the Union. While sugar or coffee, if sent by the Saint Lawrence route and through Quebec and Montreal to Toronto, must be carried more than three times as far as if sent via New York and at an enormously increased expense, the same causes operate constantly and must ever continue to do so with regard to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and all other southern ports in connection with Western Ontario, Manitoba, and other inland regions of the British possessions. If such a continental system as I desire to see should be established, no cities would feel its stimulating influences in greater force than Saint Louis and Chicago. The latter perhaps would be its heart and center.

BY OTHERS WITHOUT DISTINCTION OF PLACE OR PARTY.

I have endeavored to present the facts in the most simple form. As the resolutions I offer in regard to them have been approved by the various local commercial bodies of the United States to which they have been presented, from Chicago and Milwaukee to Boston, without partisan considerations, and, so far as I know, without any dissentient voice, so also were they unanimously recommended at the last meeting of the National Board of Trade, an association which attracts to its councils leading merchants and manufacturers from all parts of the Union. It includes alike among its members free-traders and protectionists. Several of the latter took special pains to state in explicit terms and the strongest language that they were "protectionists from the soles of their feet to the crowns of their heads," but they all without any exception advocated the unequivocal and entire adoption of the resolutions now before the House in favor of reciprocity with Canada. The opportunities of gaining immense business advantages for the people of both countries are too open and manifest to be successfully or candidly denied by any one who in a patriotic and national spirit has made any fair examination of the subject. It is entirely a matter of business, partly in those details with which merchants are most conversant and extending also into those more extensive principles and arrangements which are based on the broadest and most comprehensive considerations of statesmenship. The resolutions simply provide that a few sensible practical men, the best we can select, on our side, shall meet others of the same character appointed on behalf of Canada and ascertain how far the mutual interests of the people of both countries can be advanced. It is certain that if we are true to ourselves we can furnish citizens who will prove the equals of the representatives of the Canadians in knowledge, skill, and sagacity, and will report to our people whatever good can be derived under circumstances so favorable. Their suggestions will be submitted to Congress and the country and will be of no avail unless they obtain the approval of the National Legislature and the enactment of appropriate laws. The issue is not, as some seem to think it must be, which side can take the most shrewd advantage of the other, but how far the natural and gratuitous bounties offered by Providence to the people of both countries can be best developed for their permanent and mutual benefit. The resolutions go no further than this. They do not aim at carrying into effect any special theory. The commissioners intended to be appointed would enter upon their inquiries and consultations without any undue bias and with the whole field of investigation and conference open to them. There are no commercial barriers between the two peoples except those which are created by man and can be removed by mutual agreement and legislation.

The question is, in brief, whether with a conterminous country, inhabited by people almost identical with ourselves in education, language, origin, and character, and where wages, controlled by the necessary demand for labor in a new country with vast undeveloped resources, do not differ much from those given and received in the United States, we cannot profitably enlarge the exchanges of our products. The arguments of those who oppose the resolutions are and must be founded on local and petty interests. Carried to their logical conclusions, they would prove that it would be better for us if an open sea existed on the north of the United States instead of a fertile country with a population scarcely surpassed in intelligence, enterprise, and industry by any on the face of the globe.

CANADA COMPARED WITH THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

During the last session of Congress a treaty for the reciprocal extension of trade between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands was approved by Congress, and it has now become part of the laws of the land. Although its advantages were in some degree local and accrued primarily and chiefly to the benefit of the Pacific States, the welfare of each State is so essentially an integral part of that of the whole Union, the material gain derived by the people at large from the prosperity of each State is so great and manifest, that I gave the treaty my warmest support. It provided for a not unimportant extension of the demand for our manufactures.

Several military and political considerations also prompted me to advocate the measure. Their weight was duly appreciated by many of an opposite political party who hold what are called protectionist doctrines but perceived that they did not apply to the case then under discussion. It should be gratifying to every good and thoughtful citizen that, so far as a few small and remote islands in the Pacific Ocean are concerned, the interests of our suffering people were not neglected and that such legislation was adopted as is likely to create an increased demand for the productions of their agricultural and manufacturing labor, and, in the far-distant future may confer naval and military advantages on the United States.

From every possible point of view our relations with the Hawaiian Islands shrink into absolute insignificance when compared with those between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. Every military, naval, and commercial reason for which it is desirable that we should cultivate intercourse with the far-off islands of the Pacific applies in a different form but with incalculably increased force to our connections with our next-door neighbors on the north. The Hawaiian Islands are distant some three thousand miles from that part of our country which is nearest to them. Canada is so near to us that for many thousands of miles her territory is separated from our own only by an imaginary or mathematical line, and a man may stand at his ease in each country simultaneously. This contiguity extends, not in a straight line, but with indentations nearly doubling its length, from one side of the American continent to the other at the broadest part of our broad land. Where our countries do not thus touch each other they are separated only by lakes and rivers which in some respects furnish increased facilities for intercommunication. At various points railroads cross the boundary, thus binding the people together, if not with links of steel, with bands of iron. It would have been unwise to overlook the benefits which will accrue to us from the treaty with islands in the ends of the earth; but who can say how much greater folly and injustice we commit toward our own citizens by an illiberal and exclusive policy toward the millions whose homes are close to our own?

It was argued, and I do not disparage the force of the reasoning, that if we did not enter into a friendly commercial treaty with the Hawaiian Islands they would pass into the hands of some foreign power, and thus our influence would be weakened, and, in case of war, expeditions against us might be fitted out from the islands. Canada is under the sovereignty of that nation which, by means of her vast naval power, might, if war arose, be our most formidable antagonist. The population of the Dominion, already greater than that of this country at the time of the Revolution, will not only, as the settlement of the vast northwest increases, be as large as that of this country now is, but be computed by the hundred of millions, and be far more nearly equal to our own in the future than is now usually supposed. It should be unnecessary to dwell longer on this part of the subject. Regarded simply as a matter of military policy, the friendship of Canada is not only more important to us than that of the Hawaiian Islands but of any other power whatever on either side of the Atlantic.

ENORMOUS VALUE OF OUR PRESENT EXPORTS TO CANADA.

From the same causes which render our relations with Canada more important than those with the Hawaiian Islands in a military point of view—her contiguity to the United States, the extent of her territory, and the character of her population—the almost incomparably greater value of her trade to us in the future is also demonstrated. The comparison of the trade of the two countries with us at present admits of an approximately exact arithmetical proof. In the last calendar year of which at the present time we have any authentic commercial record, our exports to the Hawaiian Islands amounted to $783,561, while those to the British North American colonies during the fiscal year corresponding most nearly with that period were nearly fifty times as large, having been at least $38,296,531. Our exports to Canada included grain and flour to the amount of nearly twelve millions of dollars; of animals and their products the amount was $4,398,060; of raw cotton, $556,340; of coal, over two millions, and of timber, $541,151. Our manufactures exported to Canada included cotton goods to the value of $673,031—nearly as much as all our exports to the Hawaiian Islands added together—glassware, $416,708; manufactures of iron and steel, $3,377,913, and of wood, $1,376,611. These are all our own manufactures, exclusive of commodities of foreign origin. Altogether the value of our own manufactures exported to the Dominion, exclusive of coin and bullion, in the fiscal year 1875 was, as shown by our own reports, $10,197,580. Doubtless the actual amount was much larger, the accounts of exports being, probably in all countries, less accurately kept than those of imports. In the fiscal year 1876 the aggregate of the imports of all kinds to the Dominion from this country was no less than $44,093,073, of which more than half were admitted free of all duty whatever and the remainder at duties which, compared with those we exact on similar productions from Canada, appear insignificant. They largely exceed those imported into Canada from Great Britain or any other country, and yet the duties collected on imports from Great Britain exceed those collected on imports from the United States by nearly one-half.

EXPORTS OF OUR MANUFACTURES TO CANADA.

In specifying the amounts of several of our productions and manufactures exported to Canada I have adhered to our own accounts, but, as may be seen on reference to the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce and navigation for 1875, and the report on the finances for 1876, it is almost if not quite impossible to obtain full and accurate statements of our exports to Canada from our own authorities. The chief defect is that railroad cars and other land vehicles passing into adjacent territory are not required to file lists or manifests of lading similar to those required from vessels clearing for foreign countries. Hence our own returns inadequately and grossly misrepresent the real value of our exports to Canada. As duties on many of these articles are collected in Canada, accounts of them are more strictly kept in that country, although even there, owing to smuggling and undervaluations, they doubtless fall short of the real amounts. It is shown by the official statements of the commissioner of customs of the Dominion, that the value of articles produced in this country and exported to Canada, but omitted in the returns of our custom-house officers, was, in 1874, $11,424,566; in 1875, $15,596,524; and in 1876, $10,507,563. Most of these exports consisted of manufactures of cotton, wool, iron, copper, &c. How far our own reports, considered by themselves, are likely to mislead, may be inferred from the fact that to the amount of our exports of cotton manufactures in the year 1875, which was $673,031, as I have already quoted, should be added $918,813—making a total of $1,591,844; and to $3,377,913, the value of our manufactures of iron and steel exported to Canada, as shown by our own reports, should be added no less than $3,455,736, altogether $6,833,649 in this branch of manufactures alone. Similar proportions may be observed as to other exports, but it is needless to multiply details. It would be useless to argue further with those who do not see that such a market for our manufactures should receive attention and encouragement from every true friend of the people.

AN ESTABLISHED PRECEDENT.

Surely it is needless to urge that, if the Hawaiian treaty was worthy of approval by a triumphant majority, better opportunities of extending our commerce and beneficent influence nearer home and on an enormously larger scale should not be neglected. But I regard it as an auspicious omen that so large and influential a portion of the party in power, visiting in imagination the genial climes of the Hawaiian Islands, should have overcome the theories and prejudices through which more important subjects are mistily regarded, and, so to speak, have picked up a shell "on the shore of the great ocean truth." Remembering some of the advances made in physical science since the great philosopher so modestly described his own merits and discoveries, I regard the Hawaiian treaty as a precedent fraught with great advantages to the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of all parts of our country. I trust it will be the means of directing public attention to practical and easy, because mutually beneficial, methods of adjusting affairs with our neighbors, both North and South. As far as an extension of our trade with them can be carried into effect it cannot fail to be profitable to all parties to the arrangement. Our policy should be not to tax our own citizens to pay others for entering into our Union and enjoying its advantages, nor to incorporate with ourselves alien countries whose people are not in harmony with the spirit and requirements of our institutions, but simply to extend our commercial relations with them. We should thus acquire the chief benefits of actual ownership without its disadvantages. It is a necessary counterpart of the Monroe doctrine, prohibiting the interference of the Old World in the internal affairs of this continent, that we should study to promote the interests of the other American States and extend the exchange of the respective products of their labor and our own.

OTHER TREATIES FOR TRADE.

How vast the beneficial commerce between the United States and the Dominion might by this time have become if, instead of merely abrogating the former treaty, we had endeavored to improve it, or substitute for it one of more perfect reciprocity, we can now only conjecture. Practically for the time we threw aside its lessons. By others they were heeded and yielded abundant fruit. During the visit of Richard Cobden to this country in 1860 his attention was pointedly directed to the treaty then in operation between us and the Canadians. Whatever objections he entertained to such measures were fully removed by M. Chevalier, who represented the interests of France. The result was the memorable arrangement between England and France, which was speedily followed by similar treaties between other countries, and not less than fifty or sixty in number. It is the custom with a certain class of theorists to represent that in the negotiations between England and France the former was the victor and the latter a dupe. In fact both countries gained enormous advantages. A friendship arose between those two nations which is warmer and more durable than has ever existed at any other period of their history. Among the causes which have contributed to the marvelous recuperation of France and the welfare of her people none has been more powerful than her commercial treaty with England, her largest and most profitable customer, with whom her trade is nearly twice as large as with any other country, and more than four times as large as with the United States.

The exports of France to Great Britain and Ireland in 1858 amounted to about thirteen millions of pounds sterling, and in 1875 to nearly forty-seven millions. The exports from Great Britain and Ireland to France increased during the same time in a smaller ratio, or from nine millions to twenty-seven millions. Tried by the protectionist theory of what is sometimes called the balance of trade, France has enormously the advantage, but only so far as her customers in Great Britain and Ireland are enabled to buy cheaper from her than they can buy elsewhere. The late Emperor Napoleon fell in a manner likely to drag down with him any cause that he had espoused, and M. Thiers, the chief statesman who succeeded him, was at least as decidedly against the treaty as the emperor had been in its favor. But the proof of its benefits had grown plain and palpable, the interests it served were too numerous and powerful to be subverted, and M. Thiers was reluctantly compelled to yield to them.

PREVALENT DISTRESS AND A REMEDY.

Notwithstanding the obstacles we have so long interposed, our trade with Canada in 1875 amounted to over $78,000,000. According to the most reliable statistics, taking the imports into each country from the other as they are shown by the records of its own custom-houses, the trade between the two countries in 1874 and 1875 averaged more than $90,000,000 in each year. Our exports to Canada alone have for many years been four or five times as large as to Russia and much larger than those to any other country in the world, except only Great Britain, France, and Germany. In the opinion of many who are best qualified to judge on the subject, this vast aggregate of our exchanges with Canada, each representing a transaction mutually beneficial to some of the people of both countries, would soon be doubled if the existing restrictions of the custom-houses on both sides of the frontier could be removed. Is this prospect or are the facts as we now find them to be thrust aside as if of no moment in the present depressed condition of our trade and manufactures? Year after year the plight of our laboring-men throughout the country, and especially in the regions dependent upon manufactures and commerce, has grown worse and worse. Year by year since 1872 the attractions presented to the laborers of Europe have sensibly diminished, until, in the last fiscal year, the immigrants to our shores were less by nearly three hundred thousand than they were four years ago, the actual reduction within that time having been from 437,750 to 169,986. These new-comers go, it is to be supposed, to friends who are ready to receive them chiefly in those parts of the country least affected by the prevalent distress.

We are all familiar with the accounts of unparalleled and increasing destitution among our own working population. Let not repetition dull our minds so that we cannot see, nor steel our hearts so that we cannot feel the force of facts so often told and so well authenticated. In some of our largest cities the present is the third winter when two-thirds of the unskilled laborers have been unable to find employment. Multitudes of temperate, industrious, and well-trained mechanics, and of young women, with honorable independence of character and sensitive about receiving charity in any form or shape, have lost all hope, and in the depth of destitution and despair are begging to be saved from lingering death through hunger by being sent to places intended for the reception of vagrants and criminals.

LONG NEGLECT OF OUR MATERIAL INTERESTS.

During the seventeen years through which the party yet remaining in power has held the reins of Government, there has been a conspicuous and complete neglect of all the chief means for restoring prosperity to our people. The return to specie payments has chiefly, except when it has been prevented by legislation, been left to the slow progress of natural laws of finance. Nothing, if we except the reduction of wages and the increased destitution of our laborers, has been done to promote ship-building and give us again our former commercial eminence and prestige on the ocean. Except in the minute and peculiar instance of the Hawaiian Islands, nothing has been done to extend the markets for the production of our fields and manufactories. In view of the present wide-spread misery we who are placed here to frame laws for the benefit of the people shall be worthy of the most severe condemnation if we neglect to give our best attention to such enactments as will yield food and work to the suffering masses. Among the most obvious of these measures is such an extension of our trade with Canada as will yield us a larger amount of grain and other necessaries of life, increase the use of our leading thoroughfares in the North, and enlarge the outlets already existing in the Dominion for our manufactures. We see that the opportunity is open to us in the relative geographical positions of the two countries, and that even under the present restrictions the exchange of the products of labor between them is enormous. We have also confident assurances in the settled, firm, and stable character of the Canadian government and people, and their frequently expressed desire to ascertain by mutual conference with us how far our commercial relations can be emancipated and extended. This desire has been repeatedly shown in the newspapers of Canada, the resolutions passed by her boards of trade, and the authentic and official statements of her government itself.

THE WISHES AND TARIFF OF CANADA.

The Dominion board of trade at every one of its meetings has expressed an earnest and intelligent desire for an extension of trade with us, and in every instance has coupled the expression of the desire with that of a belief that the first official proposal for it should come from the Government of the United States, offers made by Canada having been regarded with so little attention on this side of the frontier. A leading representative of Canada, at the meeting of our own National Board of Trade in New York last summer, reiterated these views and no doubt uttered the general sentiment of his countrymen when he confidently assured his hearers that if Congress should adopt the resolutions now before this House for the appointment of commissioners, the Canadian government would "likewise appoint a commission, and we should for the first time since the abrogation of the old treaty have business men to sit down together, talk the matter over fairly and squarely as a practical question, deal with all its difficulties, and, if possible, bring about a treaty which will be mutually satisfactory to both countries." The Canadian minister of customs, privy council, and present governor-general have at different times fully concurred in these views, the governor-general himself in council having formally promised "that should the Government of the United States comply with the wishes expressed by the National Board of Trade the subject will receive the fullest consideration of the government of Canada."

At the time of the abrogation of the old treaty there was much just reason for the complaint of the illiberality and unfairness of the Canadian tariff on many of the productions of the United States. But all that has now been reversed. We impose on all kinds of Canadian grain and flour a duty so heavy as to be nearly prohibitory, with the single exceptions of barley and some peas, for the production of which the soil and climate of Canada and the habits of her farmers, or all these causes combined, are especially favorable. Nearly all the articles admitted into Canada free of duty under the old treaty are now admitted there free of duty, while on our side they are heavily taxed. Although Canada is an integral part of the British Empire all the manufactures of the United States are admitted there upon the same terms as those of any other colony and of Great Britain herself. The old colonial restrictions have passed away and become obliterated by the advancing power of a more enlightened policy.

MODERN POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The views I advocate have sometimes been met by the objection that whatever might be mutual interests of the United States and Canada Great Britain would not permit them to be harmoniously developed. I think there is no reason to apprehend any real difficulty on this score. If the interests of Canada are stifled and oppressed, let us be certain that we are not the wrong-doers and that the blame is put on the right shoulders. A brief review of the history of the colonies throws much light on our policy in regard to them. For the last half century they have made steady and accelerated progress toward greater freedom and independence. The measures adopted by Great Britain have undoubtedly encouraged the movement.

Soon after the first American colonists from Great Britain had surmounted the difficulties and hardships of the earliest settlements, in the regions which are now the United States, and had begun to accumulate wealth, the exclusive system was applied so far that few articles could be exported from the colonies to any other country without being first laid upon the shores of Great Britain. Next, the colonists were compelled to buy solely from British merchants, and their importations could only be made in British ships, "it being the usage of other nations to keep the plantation trade exclusively to themselves." Even the excellent Lord Chatham, distinguished as a friend of the colonies, was so far imbued with the common heresies of his time as not to hesitate in declaring that "the British colonies in North America had no right to manufacture even a nail for a horse-shoe;" and Lord Sheffield only expressed the general opinion of his day when he affirmed that "the only use of the colonies and the West India Islands is the monopoly of their consumption and the carriage of their products." On all these points increased enlightenment has effected a quiet revolution. The monopoly of the colonial trade was found to be as unprofitable to the oppressor as to the oppressed, and confirmed progress has been made in those views of public policy which are inextricably blended with magnanimity and liberality.

SUBSTANTIAL INDEPENDENCE OF CANADA.

A few years ago the government of Canada, through its financial minister, emphatically declared the right of the people of that country to decide for themselves, in all respects, the mode and extent to which taxation shall be imposed on them. The British government was warned that serious evils and future complications would result from any opposition to the rights thus asserted; and the Canadian government congratulated itself that the British ministry of that day "have been obliged to admit that we were in the right, and that any assumed interference with our rights and privileges is not for one moment to be entertained." Thus the practical rights of self-government, only obtained by the United States through revolution, were quietly conceded. The most striking point in this illustration of the reversal of the ancient relations of Great Britain and her colonies is not merely that so great a concession was made to the colonies, but that the point in dispute was an order in council disallowing a bill inflicting certain disabilities on the shipping of the United States.

The people of Great Britain have discovered that their own capitalists and laborers were injured by forcing the trade of the colonies in artificial directions and withdrawing it from the natural and really beneficial pursuits in which it would have been employed. The revolutionary war in the United States strengthened these impressions

It was found that the independence of the United States and their consequent prosperity contributed materially to the well-being of Great Britain, whose tax-payers were relieved from the expense and trouble of governing distant and extensive regions, while the benefits of intercourse with them not only remained but were augmented. The belief has become more and more prevalent in the mother-country that the means by which she can most securely and profitably derive the elements of real prosperity from her colonies is by permitting them to direct their industry into those channels which their natural position and advantages indicate as the most remunerative.

On the one hand concessions were made to the colonists by permitting them to resort to the markets of the world and tax British manufactures; on the other, the British people were gradually emancipated from the oppressive taxation which gave the colonies special privileges in Great Britain itself. The latter was at first especially conspicuous as to the indispensable articles of grain, flour, and lumber.

The military and naval defense of the colonies remains as the only substantial relic of the ancient policy. The consideration given for it is withdrawn. It remains as a tax on the people of Great Britain without affording them any adequate compensation, and the declarations of their leading statesmen of all parties, the actions of their government, and the tendencies of public opinion clearly indicate the early termination of this anomalous and inconsistent condition. The time is approaching when, as the most zealous defenders of the old colonial system have admitted would be the case, it will be found that "it is all of a piece and must either stand or fall together."

So evidently correct are the frequent assertions of Canada that her government, acting for her legislature and people, must, whatever may be the deference they owe to the imperial authorities, decide for themselves as to all matters connected with the tariff, and so completely has the principle thus announced been carried out in legislation, that Great Britain, in reply, is throwing the naval and military defense of the Canadians upon themselves.

OPINION OF LEADING BRITISH STATESMEN.

A former governor-general of Canada substantially declared in the Imperial Parliament that if Canada should ask for independence the request would readily be granted. If we look among those British statesmen now living and who for many years have been leaders in the actual and progressive career of their country, and whose influence was never more completely manifested than in the recent change in her European and Asiatic policy, we find in their public speeches the most creditable and liberal expressions regarding the commerce of the United States with Canada and the relations of Great Britain with the latter. The profitable and humanizing effects of the commercial treaty between Great Britain and France point out significantly and decisively how valuable a judicious commercial treaty between the United States and Canada would be, not simply in increasing sales but in promoting the advancement of the soundest doctrines of civilization and international good-will.

I know of no expressions of modern statesmanship better worthy of being borne in mind by every American citizen, and regarded as axiomatic in our conduct toward our sister-States and Canada, than those terms of glowing eloquence in which Hon. John Bright depicted his hopes that the day might come when the whole of this vast continent might become one great federation of States, and, free from military control, without a custom-house inside through the whole length and breadth of its territory, but with freedom everywhere, equality everywhere, law everywhere, peace everywhere, would afford at least some hope that man is not forsaken of heaven and that the future of our race might be better than the past.

The Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, when premier, speaking in a debate in the House of Commons, lamented that it had been the fate of the transatlantic possessions of European nations that in every instance when they had reached maturity separation had been carried out by war or bloodshed, leaving behind them feelings of pain, hatred, or shame. He declared the true policy toward Canada to be that if separation should arrive it may come in a friendly, and not a hostile, form, but in true accord with the best spirit of the age.

OUR POLICY AS IT OUGHT TO BE.

It seems to me that we do not in our statesmanship adequately recognize and appreciate the relations actually existing between Great Britain and her North American possessions or adapt our policy to the facts as they are. One of the main errors of Great Britain in her treatment of those colonies from which our Union was formed was the discouragement of their industry except so far as it was subsidiary to her own. Perhaps no part of her conduct toward us was more unjust or injurious, or contributed more powerfully to the causes of the Revolution. I fear that the recollection of it, rankling in our memories, has sometimes led us to such legislation in commercial affairs as we have been satisfied to think must be beneficial to ourselves because it is inconvenient or prejudicial to others. This is one of the most prevalent and pernicious sophistries by which mankind has ever been deluded and afflicted. Let us look to ourselves and take heed lest in our day, in the plenitude of our power and at a more enlightened period of the world's history, we in our commercial treatment of weaker neighboring States fall into the same kind of error as that which Great Britain practiced toward us, but has utterly discarded in her modern treatment of her colonies. Canada, it is true, is not our possession, but as compared with the United States she is practically in her infancy. In refusing even to consider by what means our trade with her can be increased with mutual benefit to the people of both countries we follow the evil example set us in a more aggravated form by Great Britain in the early days of our own history.

SELF-REFUTED ERRORS.

Sanguine and vivid expectations have been entertained by some who laid claim to profound knowledge and statesmanlike views, but who have lived to see the error of their hopes, that by a rigorous and exclusive policy Canada would speedily be compelled to implore annexation to the Union. The time, it has been publicly said, before she would thus be brought on her knees was so short that it should be counted by months, and not by years; but time has only made more evident what was from the beginning sufficiently obvious, that the Canadians, being of the same human nature with ourselves, actuated by similar sentiments and passions, are repelled by repulsion while they might be attracted by a friendly and liberal policy which through a natural and interminable series of profitable transactions would bring people already homogeneous more and more into communication with each other.

SENTIMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES TOWARD CANADA.

It cannot be said that there is any real want of friendly feeling in the United States toward the Canadians. Many of them migrate to this country, and are soon scarcely distinguishable from our native-born citizens, not a few of whom have taken up their abodes in the Dominion and become prosperous and prominent. If Canada should be oppressed and to gain her liberty and rights be driven to arms as we were at the time of the Revolution, our sympathy from one end of the Union to the other would not merely be sentimental, but would evince itself by practical demonstrations at every point of our frontier. Happily for all the parties concerned, the prospect of any such contingency has long passed and the appropriate way of testifying our good-will is not by self-immolation in the loss of life and material wealth, but by the sacrifice of an old prejudice and an outworn theory and the adoption of such commercial measures as will promote our interests as well as those of our neighbors.

THE CORRECT VIEW OF TRADE WITH CANADA.

I have said that Canada has wisely pursued a more liberal coursr toward the United States than we have toward her. She admits oue manufactures on equal terms with those of Great Britain, and at very moderate rates of duty. The chief products of our agriculture are admitted free of all duty whatever. At the same time this liberality redounds to her benefit. She is studying her own interest. By charging no duties on our flour, wheat, corn, and other grain she obtains a large surplus for exportation and encourages transportation and the profitable employment of her people from one end of her railroads and canals to the other. She finds her own profit in all this. The prices of wheat, flour, corn, cheese, and cut meats are telegraphed to this side of the Atlantic and regulate our own. They are posted up and proclaimed in our leading marts of trade. Even in fresh meats a vast trade with Europe is rapidly progressing. Immense quantities are weekly exported from the United States and Canada, and in a few years Great Britain will be at least as dependent on this continent for her supplies of fresh beef and other meats as she now is for breadstuffs. As the prices in foreign markets mainly determine those here and in Canada it is suicidal to many of our mercantile, manufacturing, and carrying interests and beneficial to no other interests whatever to charge duties on the importation into this country of the farming products I have named, and the list could be very widely extended. Our exportations to Canada of all these articles is enormously greater than hers to us, and it is created mainly by the exportations to Europe which we impede by our laws while Canada gives facilities for them. For instance, in 1875 our imports of wheat from Canada under our tariff amounted, according to our official statistics, to only $296,588, while our exports to her were of the value of $6,070,167 in gold. A certain class of theorists may think they detect in this a very favorable balance of trade. In reality it represents how much of our wheat was exported to Europe by Canadian routes. The enlargements now in progress on the Canadian canals will force public attention to these facts. We ought to be prepared to meet them in advance. When our ports were open to the free admission of Canadian wheat our forwarders and merchants and their employés reaped the profits. There was also a local benefit to our millers and many communities. Thus when I speak of a liberal policy I do not mean that of self-destruction or sacrifice of our own interests, but one in which the benefits of mutual profit are recognized, a belief with which the issues of individual and national well-being are most intimately connected, and that short-sighted view—the most pernicious and perhaps the most common of all political errors—that the gain of one man or nation must be the loss of another, is discarded.

WHAT PROTECTION MAY BE IN CANADA.

Besides the additions to our direct exports and the increase in the sales of our manufactures both to Canada and, through a better supply of raw materials, to other countries, which might be secured by means of a fair treaty of commerce with Canada, other points demand our consideration. Year after year the Canadians have continued their liberal treatment of our trade and manufactures in the hope that the whole system of commerce might be remodeled between us with due regard to the interests of both countries, but incited by our large exportations the protectionist theories grow yearly stronger and stronger in Canada and if her people should adopt a system of what are sometimes called "reciprocal duties," charging on our productions the same duties as we levy on hers, the result would be ruinous and almost prohibitory on our exports to her. If, on the other hand, the Dominion should renew, as is sometimes suggested, a closer connection with Great Britain, the trade between those two countries might become as free and untrammeled as it is between all the States of our own Union. In this event it would manifestly be impossible to check smuggling on an enormous scale from the Dominion into the United States. The difficulties already attending a proper surveillance of our northern frontier were lately described by the Secretary of the Treasury as being in some respects insurmountable. In the contingency to which I have alluded an addition of several thousands of men to our revenue service, with the accompanying expense, would not suffice to prevent a vast illicit trade, with demoralizing effects on our people and incalculable injury to our revenue.

CONCLUSION.

I look forward to that time in the not distant future when a truly fraternal comity shall prevail throughout this continent from that habitable part of it which is nearest the arctic regions to the tropics, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean; and when this sentiment shall find its natural expression, not in lawless and desolating filibustering expeditions or hostile inroads of any kind, but be manifested and continually increased by those peaceful exchanges of the products of human industry which yield profitable employment and make homes happy. Nature herself in the varieties of climate and resources has provided for this plan by permanent and beneficial laws against which we make our temporary and destructive statutes. From such a continental and truly American system, we who occupy a central position between the North and South should not only satisfy our needs, but by being the merchants and carriers for our neighbors on both sides derive larger profits than any of them. Because in population and power we are the foremost nation of the continent, it becomes our duty to ourselves and to others to take the lead in giving practical development to the bounties which Providence has placed within our reach. The first step toward its attainment is by ascertaining definitely through inquiries made by efficient and reliable commissioners how far we can extend our commercial relations with Canada, whose people and government invite us not less by their stable, intelligent, and progressive character than by the assurances they have already more or less formally given us. Of all affairs of foreign policy this opportunity of cheapening the materials of our manufactures and extending our markets is the most important Next to integrity in our Government and the preservation of our liberties, no subject more deeply concerns the interests of the people. My motion is simply for the appointment of a commission of inquiry. It is so far as I know unanimously approved by the leading commercial and business men of the country without distinction of party, and should meet with the same just consideration from both parties in this House.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. MARK H. DUNNELL,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 26, 1877.

The House having under consideration the bill to provide an electoral commission—

Mr. DUNNELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not at all probable that it is important to this House or to the country what may be the views which I entertain in regard to this bill or the reasons which will influence my vote; yet I am disposed to occupy the time that by chance comes to me in the discussion of the pending question.

I have given to this subject whatever attention I could; I have bestowed upon it whatever of reading I could command. I have, however, up to this time, been unable to bring my mind to the conviction that I should vote for this bill. I do not feel at liberty to give it my support.

I am not unmindful of the perils which threaten. I am not unmindful of the difficulties that lie in the way. I am not unmindful of the uncertainties that hang over the result of the election that was held in the country on the 7th of November last. I would be glad if a way was opened by which these uncertainties might be dispelled and these difficulties removed. I would be glad if a better way was opened to me to which I might give my assent and which should determine definitely and certainly and without unfavorable results what was the action of the American people at the late presidential election.

I find in this bill many things which influence me to such an extent that I cannot give it my approval. We have at this hour a Supreme Court that commands the respect of the American people. There is no man, democrat or republican, anywhere in the country who does not approach the Supreme Court to-day with absolute respect and who would not argue his case there with an assurance of a fair trial and of an eminently just determination.

But it is now proposed to approach this court; it is now proposed to attack it; it is now proposed to damage it, and to hurt it so that an age will not be sufficient to wipe out the baneful effects of our action.

In the very frame-work of this bill it is admitted, and it is admitted in arguments on that side and on this side of the House, that the bill is so framed as by its very terms to declare upon the partisanship of four judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Until this bill was brought in here, who of us had heard of the partisanship of any of these judges? Who of us had heard or who cared what might be the political bias of these great men presiding over the immense destinies committed to their hands? But henceforth, while they occupy seats upon that bench, they will be seriously injured in so far as we have pronounced against them as partisans. It is not contended that we are to have a fair determination, only as we are to have it on the assumption that the majority of the five judges shall be either republican or democratic. This is the argument, this is the logic; nobody denies it and nobody will deny it.

I say that the emergency has not yet arisen when the American Congress should put its hands on the Supreme Court of the United States. That department of the Government was not created for the purpose of making a President. It never was authorized to create a President. The fathers never contemplated that the Supreme Court should touch the presidential question. It never has been stated in any of the decisions or discussions of earlier days that the Supreme Court at any time or under any circumstances should ever be dragged into the determination of the question of who has been elected President.

But we propose to bring the court in now and compel it to do the dirty work of a party canvass, to examine into ballot-boxes, as some will insist they should do. It is proposed to make these five judges a part and parcel of a returning board that shall pronounce in favor of the election of one man or the other to the Presidency. I protest against it. The emergency does not justify it. The exigencies are not such as to compel us thus to trample down the dignity and the high character of this tribunal of justice.

I have another objection to this bill. Its passage at this time will establish a precedent that will come up hereafter with terrible force and effect, will come up again before all of us shall have passed from public life and public duties.

We are confronted here to-day with what? With the declaration of a defeated party; that is all. Under the forms of law Governor Hayes has been elected President of the United States for the next four years. The enveloped certificates in the hands of the Presiding Officer of the Senate to-day, though they have never been read by mortal eye, declare the solemn fact to the American people that Rutherford B. Hayes has been elected President. You know it, Mr. Speaker, we all know it. It has been admitted in argument upon the other side that that is the determination of the American people, as discovered by the certificates of election issued, as they have always been hitherto.

It is now proposed that we shall say to the people of the country that we, here in Congress, have a part in the election of a President. I do not believe that it was ever intended that Congress should participate in a presidential election. Congress shall simply sit and listen to the voice of the people as it comes from the broken seals of State certificates; that and nothing more.

At the end of the next four years we may have a closely contested presidential election, and then this grand farce will be played over again. By this bill we are to elect either Hayes or Tilden. Let the election of 1880 result as this has done, closely and narrowly, and let the two Houses of Congress be of different political complexions, and we must go through this form again, and again deny to the people their voice as expressed at the polls.

Sir, I am unwilling to make this precedent. It has been said here by one that this is only for to-day. But you know, Mr. Speaker, with what tenacity precedents hold their place in the Digest which you have in your hand. We all know how precedents stick to a republican government, how they cling to it. It takes a century to get rid of a precedent.

We are asked here to establish a precedent. One honorable Senator in the other end of the Capitol has said within a few days: "This precedent will endure; it must endure; it ought to endure." I am not prepared, I am not quite ready yet, to establish the enduring precedent that Congress can stifle the voice of the people as expressed at the ballot-box. Rather I will say that I stand by the voice of the people against this usurpation of power.

If an election has been certified to Congress according to the forms of law and agreeably to the precedents since the beginning of the Republic, it is revolutionary to resist the declared will of the people. Congress should not attempt in any way to thwart that will. This has to be done but a few times before Congress shall elect a President, and not the people. When that comes, then the President will be the creature of Congress, and not of the people. If a doubt exists as to the true result of the late election, that doubt should be given to the people.

This bill provides a method of settling the question who was elected, whether Hayes or Tilden. Five democratic and five republican members of Congress have been selected. Two judges are selected who are admitted to have democratic biases, and two judges with republican biases. Is it not admitted by this very arrangement that the decision is to be a political one? If so, will not the judges be compelled to make political decisions? Can this be done without vast injury to the judges? Will their decision satisfy the people? The fifth judge will settle the presidential question of 1876, if I am correct. These judges will be traduced as soundly as the members of Congress who shall be on the commission, and, indeed, much more so, for the country will wonder at partisan decisions from men whose tenure of office is made secure by the Constitution itself.

If Hayes has been elected, Congress itself and alone should declare the result, and without the aid of any count; and if Tilden has been elected let him be so declared. The patriotism of Congress should be equal to the emergency. If this proposed commission shall solve the vexed question, the country may be glad that it was created. It is nevertheless the duty of Congress to guard the liberties of the people and not sacrifice them by the adoption of measures not contemplated by the Constitution.

The decision of the commission will be in the support of existing precedents in accepting the findings of State canvassing boards and in a refusal to go behind those returns, or it will establish a precedent for Congress to contest presidential elections whenever they occur, by overturning the State certificates of electors. For one I hesitate to create a board which may give us this last result. I can see in it only evil to the Republic.

If the commission shall follow the established precedents and decide the now unsettled question without the use of methods or means hostile to the fullest rights of the people, then every patriot would rejoice in the result. While I will not impugn the motives of any man or party who supports this measure, my fears that it will work against the rights of the people will cause me to withhold my vote. One or the other party will or may gain by it. The party defeated at the polls may have the President. No one desires a war or civil commotion; yet we must not underrate the magnitude of the constitutional right which we put to the test or subject to what we may properly call a hazard or chance. It will require as much patriotism to abide by the decision of the commission as by the action of Congress in the solution of the question. Whatever may be the result we can but hope that the Republic will be saved and that no precedent be made that shall lessen and render insecure the liberties of the people.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. H. B. BANNING,

OF OHIO.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 25, 1877,

On the decision of the commission on the electoral vote of Oregon.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I have taken little part in the discussion connected with this electoral commission. My reason for my silence is to be found in the fact that I did not approve of the course pursued by my party. I have kept my peace for the same reason that I voted for the bill, because I was not presumptuous enough to set my judgment up against that of the entire democratic party. But, sir, what I feared in the passage of that act is history now. My party agreed to an appeal to what it believed was a tribunal composed of high-toned, learned, and conscientious men. They agreed to that act known as the electoral commission in entire good faith. I believed at the time myself that the judges of our Supreme Court could be relied upon as jurists, as far above party bias as they are supposed to be above bribes. My opposition to the act was based upon the fact that we had nothing to adjudicate. I believed then as I believe now that Mr. Tilden is the President-elect of the United States. This is the opinion of the country. It is the opinion of the world, conversant of our affairs. If any gentleman questions this let him answer me the question why it is necessary to have an armed force here to inaugurate Mr. Hayes when not a solitary bayonet is necessary to the inauguration of Mr. Tilden. With this conviction upon my mind I could not consent to an arbitration. There was nothing in my opinion to arbitrate.

And now, sir, I break the silence I have imposed upon myself and take part in this discussion, because events have demonstrated that the fears of a few were better than the judgment of the many. We went into this abitration in good faith and we find in the end that we are disposed of with insincerity. This is using the mildest term applicable to the situation. The fact is that, in the eyes of the country, in the conscience of the people, this electoral commission we have created is a national returning board, no better or more reliable than that of Louisiana which caused us all this trouble. I do not propose, indeed I have not the time, to make a review of its extraordinary decisions. I can only give you the opinion of the people, which is my own, and that is that the findings of the so-called court are simply infamous. They aggravate the evils the court was organized to correct. Now, sir, it would be well for us to find if possible some peaceable way out of this difficulty. But I cannot under any circumstances, let the immediate consequences be what they may, give my consent to the findings of this commission. I shrink from any difficulty that affects the quiet working of our Government. The thought of a civil war is to me shocking; having gone through one I shudder at the suggestion. But when I remember that, to abide by and consent to the findings of this commission, I aid in destroying the faith of the American people in its ballot-box, I believe that there is no evil scarcely presented to us that we had better not encounter. The elective franchise is acknowledged and known to be the very foundation of our self-government. If a ballot is not a ballot until manipulated by a returning board, self-government is a sham and a mockery. Now, sir, we are called upon to sustain a national returning board that had as its essence making it a tribunal five justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. We find running through all its decisions, three of these being republicans, voting on one side, and two of them, being democrats, voting on the other. This was uniformly the case except where Justice Bradley voted with the democrats on a motion to adjourn and Justices Clifford and Field voted with the republicans upon the admission of Cronin's vote in the case of Oregon.

Why, sir, this tribunal does not command the respect of the people. It is laughed at and spoken of as a game at cards. It has convinced nobody; its findings carry no weight. In popular estimation we are precisely where we began when this commission was created. The people of the United States expect us to-day to repudiate this commission, as it expected us on the meeting of Congress to repudiate the finding of the Louisiana returning board. I only express the conscience of the people in saying that when the time comes that a party repudiated at the polls can through fraud or force, or both, inaugurate its defeated candidate for the Presidency our Republic does not exist even in form. We have parted from all the fathers left us. We have parted from all that a hundred years have made precious. Consent to this and we may as well meet together and decide the sort of constitutional monarchy that will suit us best. I for one object to a despotism built on J. Madison Wells and Justice Bradley. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, and with the two illustrious examples before me in the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. PIERCE and Mr. SEELYE,] that we had reached a crisis of so grave a sort in our Government that men would rise above party allegiance and give themselves to the good of the people.

In 1861 I cast behind me all party ties and gave my poor services to my Government. I was young, inexperienced, and enthusiastic. My knowledge of human nature had not then taught me how selfish, bigoted, and unthinking partisan affiliation could make a man. I was not to blame, however, for I found thousands on thousands of democrats under the musket fighting side by side with their political opponents for the glory of our flag and the preservation of our Government. Can it be that we have fallen upon more evil days? Are the patriots of the republican party limited in this House to two men? Be that as it may, our duty on this side is plain before us. To us has been intrusted the will of the people. We would be unfaithful to that trust if we consent to and assist in the inauguration of a defeated candidate for the Presidency, whose inauguration is based on the finding of a commission that indorses the finding of the Louisiana returning board.

Now, sir, we have it in proof that this Louisiana returning board went about peddling its powers, offering the State to the highest bidder. The people will not be satisfied with the legal technicalities that shut out an investigation of these infamous frauds. They have no respect for the seal of a governor that covers corruption such as this. And the distinction is so nicely drawn by these learned eight of the commission that the people cannot see or comprehend it. They cannot understand why the seal of a governor that shuts out investigation in Florida or Louisiana fails to produce the same result in Oregon. The whole affair is regarded in the public mind precisely what a member of the commission designated it, "a game of chance."

The American people have not yet sunk so low as to submit their dearest rights, their grandest inheritance, all that they hope to leave their children, to the hands of a few political gamblers.

Our duty is plain before us. We cannot surrender that sacred trust given to our keeping; no surrender. We must record ourselves upon the side of the people and if the threatened evil comes to our unhappy country it must be without our consent or approbation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this minority candidate, the man who failed to secure the voice of the people at the polls, is inaugurated at Washington it will be because the people prefer four years more of tyranny and fraud to a night of anarchy. I doubt the correctness of this conclusion. It is never safe to compound a felony; the wrong that is countenanced may grow under the favor until it exists without consent. The men who now ask of us a tribunal to decide this question may hereafter commit the wrong without any tribunal at all.

The Late Election in Mississippi.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. LYNCH,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the report of the select committee on the late election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making a partisan speech. I recognize the fact that we are still in the midst of an important crisis, in consequence of which it behooves every lover of his country to put patriotism above party. It is not my purpose to speak with regard to the manner in which the late election was conducted in Louisiana, except in an incidental way. My main purpose is to call public attention to some of the grave irregularities that were committed in the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. It is hardly necessary for me to say that this is to me anything else but a pleasant duty. Every consideration of love of home, of section and people, would necessarily cause me to be anxious to throw the mantle of charity over the faults and shortcomings of that people, rather than expose them to the public gaze. I confess that my inclination is in this direction. But when the offenses of a people or a portion of them are sufficiently grave to bring reproach upon our institutions and demoralize society, then their concealment will be more in the nature of a crime than a charitable act. It is in obedience, therefore, to a sense of public duty that I shall lay before the country some of the causes that produced what is called by some, the great political revolution, in the State of Mississippi. But I shall not do this because the electoral votes of that State have been cast for the candidate of the democratic party. However anxious we may be that the man of our choice should be successful, yet I hold that it is the duty every true American citizen to cordially and cheerfully acquiesce in the will of the people when legally and fairly ascertained according to the forms of law, whether it be in accordance with our wishes or not. I presume there are none who will deny that the perpetuity of our system of Government depends upon the sacredness and security of the ballot-box, and that whenever our elective system ceases to be pure and sacred, then the foundation-stone of our governmental system will have been destroyed and the final dissolution of the Government, possibly through a bloody revolution, will be but a question of time.

Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest hesitation in asserting that if elections such as the one held in Mississippi in November last are to be accepted by the people of this country as a legal and valid expression of the will of the people of a State, then indeed our elective system will have come to be a convenient medium for giving legal effect to the most outrageous frauds that were ever committed in the conduct of elections. The frauds that were committed upon the ballot-box in that State at the last election in the interest of the democratic party, to say nothing of terrorism and violence, were carried so far and were made so general in their application that they have not, in my judgment, a parallel in the history of a State in this Union.

Mr. Speaker, these frauds were carried so far beyond the bounds of reason, decency, and propriety that no man who has the slightest regard for his reputation, who believes in maintaining and upholding our governmental system, can for a moment defend them, countenance them, or indorse them. The frauds that were committed in the sixth congressional district alone, to say nothing of violence, made a change in the vote of the State of not less than 10,000; and the frauds that were committed in that district, in connection with violence, made a change in the vote of the State of not less than 20,000. Some may think that these are extravagant assertions, but I make them upon my knowledge as a citizen of the State. Every assertion that I have made is susceptible of the clearest proof. To give some idea as to how the election was conducted, I will call particular attention to the sixth district. The counties of which that district is now composed have voted at previous elections as follows:

Republican	20,949
Democratic	3,374
Republican majority	17,575

1871.

Republican	20,312
Democratic	3,156
Republican majority	17,156

1872.

Republican	21,389
Democratic	4,190
Republican majority	17,199

1875.

Republican	15,895
Democratic	9,833
Republican majority	6,062

The following is the result in 1876:

Democratic	15,788
Republican	11,188
Democratic majority	4,600

In 1875 fraud and violence were confined chiefly to four counties—Coahoma, Washington, Warren, and Claiborne. Otherwise the result would have been about the same that year as at previous elections. In 1876 the frauds that were committed in the four counties above named were made applicable to every county in the district, with possibly one or two exceptions. I will now give some particulars as to how the election was conducted in 1876:

ADAMS COUNTY.

The frauds that were committed in Adams County made a change of over 1,200 votes in that county alone. To give a correct idea of the strength of the two parties in the county, I will give the vote of the county at several preceding elections:

1869.

Total vote polled	3,882
Republican	3,173
Democratic	709
Republican majority	2,463

1872.

Total vote polled	3,783
Republican	2,972
Democratic	811
Republican majority	2,161

1875.

Total vote polled	3,419
Republican	2,626
Democratic	793
Republican majority	1,833

1876.

Total vote polled	3,949
Republican	2,965
Democratic	1,484
Republican majority	581

The above is the vote for Congressman as officially returned. I do not charge and do not believe that the number of votes counted was in excess of the number actually polled; but by comparing the registered vote of each election precinct with the official returns of the precincts it will be clearly seen where the frauds were committed.

It will be seen from the above that the revolution in favor of democracy and "reform" was confined exclusively to two precincts—Washington and Kingston. The returns from the other precincts were just about as the republicans had calculated. What, then, was the cause of this great and unexpected change at Washington and Kingston? The answer is an easy one. There were over 600 republican tickets taken out of the ballot-boxes at those two precincts, and the same number of democratic tickets substituted in their stead. I went to Kingston on election day myself, and remained there from the time the polls were opened until two o'clock in the afternoon, at which hour the election officers took a recess for dinner. Up to that time 361 votes had been polled, and to my own personal knowledge over 300 of that number were straight republican tickets. One hundred and twenty-six votes were polled after dinner, about 85 of that number being republican. When the votes were counted at night there were just 91 votes in the box for the republican electoral ticket and 85 for the congressional candidate, thus showing clearly that all, or nearly all, of the republican votes that were polled before dinner were taken out of the box when they went to dinner and the same number of democratic tickets substituted in their stead. At the Washington precinct they took no recess for dinner, but after the polls were closed at night they counted a few tickets and then took a recess until the next morning. When they met the next morning to proceed with the count it was ascertained that between two and three hundred republican tickets had been taken out of the box and the same number of democratic tickets substituted in their stead. The objective point, however, was to carry the election for Congressman. In changing the tickets, therefore, they were generous and magnanimous enough to put in about fifty tickets containing the names of the republican candidates for presidential electors with that of the democratic candidate for Congress. This accounts for the material difference in the vote for President and Congressman. It is perhaps proper to state that the republicans were allowed but one inspector of elections at each box, and the ballot-box remained in the possession of a democrat.

PUBLIC OPINION.

It will perhaps be remembered by some that in a speech which I had the honor of delivering in this Hall during the last session of Congress I stated that the election of 1875 in the State of Mississippi brought to the front the worst element in the ranks of the democratic party in that State. The election of 1876 fully substantiated that assertion. Democrats who reside in counties that were allowed to go republican in 1875 have been tantalized ever since and characterized as cowards. Public opinion has become so demoralized that the commission of the most outrageous frauds upon the ballot-box is not only encouraged, tolerated, and justified, but it is absolutely demanded as a condition-precedent to recognition in the party of reform according to the modern acceptation of that term. These frauds are apparently committed without the slightest compunction of conscience and without the slightest regard for any law, moral or statutory. To carry elections with or without votes, peaceably and fairly if possible, forcibly and unfairly if necessary, have now become to be settled maxims with the element that is now in the ascendency in the democratic party in that State. Honesty and fairness in the management and conduct of elections on their part are the exception, and not the rule. But they did not seem to be satisfied with the inauguration of the policy of fraud, but deemed it essential to inaugurate or rather continue the policy of violence as well. Nearly every democratic club in a number of counties in the State is an armed military orgnization, brought into existence for aggressive political purposes. In some of these counties the violence and terrorism was so intense that not a republican meeting was allowed to be held nor a republican speech to be made at any time during the campaign. It is hardly necessary to say that in such locations lawlessness reigns supreme. Republicans who reside in such localities are permitted to do so simply as a matter of favor and not as a matter of right. The only law that is recognized or respected is the law of force. There is absolutely no security for life, liberty, or property except such as may be afforded as a gracious favor by these armed clubs. I now call attention to Warren County.

In Warren County there are about seven thousand voters, and over five thousand of that number are colored men and republicans. In 1876 over three thousand republicans were positively denied the right to register and consequently the right to vote. To give a correct idea of the strength of the two parties I will give the vote of the county at several preceding elections:

Total vote polled	5,638
Republican	4,560
Democratic	1,078
Republican majority	3,482

1872.

Total vote polled	6,014
Republican	4,729
Democratic	1,285
Republican majority	3,444

1875.

Total vote polled	5,648
Democratic	3,606
Republican	2,042
Democratic majority	1,564

The following is the result in 1876:

Total vote polled	2,658
Democratic	2,043
Republican	615
Democratic majority	1,428

The elections held in 1869 and in 1872 were conducted with perfect fairness, and can therefore be accepted as a fair test of the strength of the two parties. The election held in 1875 is generally admitted to have been a fraud and a swindle. Senators BAYARD and MCDONALD, as members of the Senate committee that investigated the election of 1875, declared in their minority report that the election was a fraud, and that a ticket had been declared elected that had not been voted for by any one in the county.

The charge that over three thousand republican voters were denied the right to register and consequently the right to vote is fully substantiated by the official returns. In the country districts, where the colored voters are largely in the majority, the registrars would make affirmative answers to certain unlawful and unauthorized questions a condition-precedent to registration. Whenever a voter would fail to give an affirmative answer to any one of these questions he was told to step aside. But in the city of Vicksburgh, where the bulk of the democratic vote of the county is, no such questions were asked, and thus every white man who desired to do so was allowed to register, while thousands of colored voters were denied that right. But even if those whom they allowed to register had been allowed to vote, and the votes counted as polled, the result in the county would have been different, for we find the registration, though incomplete and fraudulent, to be about as follows: whites 2,019, blacks 1,689.

It will be seen from the above that the democratic vote is only 24 in excess of the whole number of white men registered, while the republican vote is 1,074 less than the whole number of colored men registered. This result was brought about by refusing to receive the votes of a large number of colored men, and it is also believed that frauds were committed at several precincts, similar to those that were committed at Washington and Kingston, in Adams County. The Davis Bend box, where over 400 republican votes were polled, and not more than about 5 democratic votes were polled, was rejected by the registrars for alleged irregularities. They did not pursue the same course in this county that was pursued in a majority of the republican counties. In a majority of the republican counties they allowed the colored men to register and vote, but before proceeding with the count they would take out republican tickets by thousands and substitute democratic tickets in their stead, and then telegraph over the country that the colored men had voted the democratic ticket. In Warren County they thought it would be more convenient, and perhaps more honorable, to disfranchise the republican voters, and not allow them to vote at all. They were satisfied that the colored men were republicans, and, if allowed to vote at all, would vote for the candidates of that party. Every effort that had been made to induce them to join the democracy had proved unsuccessful.

The devotion manifested by the colored voters for the republican party under such circumstances is certainly worthy of the highest possible commendation, even though the wisdom or propriety of this devotion may sometimes be open to question. The democrats of Warren County know that the colored voters of that county are republicans, and therefore they concluded to disfranchise them by thousands.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker; here are more than three thousand sovereign citizens of this country; men who are clothed by the Constitution of their country with the right to participate in the choice of their own rulers; men who laid their lives upon the altar of their country in the hour of its need; and yet these men were positively denied the right to vote, for no other reason than because they are republicans. It cannot be said that they failed, refused, or neglected to conform to the requirements of law, for they did everything that the law required of them. Their disfranchisement was the result of a settled determination to deprive them of their rights and privileges of American citizens.

CLAIBORNE COUNTY.

In Claiborne County not less than 1,000 republican voters were positively denied the right to register. Terrorism and violence were inaugurated by the democrats and continued up to the election. The election was also characterized by great frauds.

The following information will show the strength of the two parties at several preceding elections:

Total vote polled	2,548
Republican	2,091
Democratic	457
Republican majority	1,634

1872.

Total vote polled	2,724
Republican	2,238
Democratic	484
Republican majority	1,752

1875.

Total vote polled	1,590
Democratic	1,094
Republican	496
Democratic majority	598

Total vote polled	1,924
Democratic	1,498
Republican	426
Democratic majority	1,072

The above figures speak for themselves. It requires no argument to show that the elections of 1875 and 1876 were carried by fraud, violence, and terrorism. In further proof of the charge that the election held in 1876 was characterized by great frauds, I will compare the total number of votes polled with the total number of voters registered:

Total number of voters registered	2,196
White	917

It will be seen that the total vote polled was only 272 less than the whole number of voters registered, while the democratic vote is 581 more than the whole number of white men registered and the republican vote is 853 less than the whole number of colored men registered. Admitting that the 272 voters who failed to vote were colored men, it will be seen that there were still 581 colored men who did vote, and whose votes were counted as having been polled for the democrats. That that number of colored men voted the democratic ticket is what no reasonable man who is familiar with the politics of the county will affirm.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

In Jefferson as in Adams County the registration was conducted with fairness and impartiality; but a reign of terror was inaugurated throughout the county by the democrats. Republicans were not allowed to hold public meetings under any circumstances. The democratic party of the county is an armed military organization. Armed bodies of democrats would attend, interrupt, and break up every meeting the republicans would attempt to hold. The election was a farce from beginning to end, as will be clearly seen by comparing the election of 1876 with several preceeding elections.

Total vote polled	2,334
Republican	1,919
Democratic	415
Republican majority	1,504

1872.
Total vote polled	2,152
Republican	1,698
Democratic	454
Republican majority	1,244

1875.
Total vote polled	2,600
Republican	1,922
Democratic	678
Republican majority	1,244

1876.
Total vote polled	1,965
Democratic	1,545
Republican	420
Democratic majority	1,125

There were registered in 1876 2,940 voters: 2,154 colored and 786 whites. It will be seen that the total vote polled was 975 less than the whole number of voters registered. The democratic vote was 759 more than the whole number of white men registered. Admitting that the 975 voters who failed or were denied the right to vote were colored men and republicans, still it will be seen that the difference between the republican vote and the whole number of colored men who voted is 759. The conclusion is irresistible that an organized system of frauds and swindles upon the ballot-box was inaugurated in nearly every republican county in the State. It was the settled determination of the democracy to carry the election peaceably and fairly if possible, forcibly and unfairly if necessary.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

In Washington County the republicans were positively denied representation on any of the boards that were appointed for holding the elections at the several voting-precincts. There were registered in 1876 4,648 colored men, and 1,264 whites. Republican clubs were organized throughout the county with a membership of over three thousand, and yet the official returns as counted and officially promulgated are as follows: Democratic, 2,905; republican, 1,591; democratic majority, 1,314. The following is the vote of the county at several preceding elections:

Total vote polled	2,670
Republican	2,530
Democratic	140
Republican majority	2,390

1872.
Total vote polled	2,757
Republican	2,562
Democratic	195
Republican majority	2,367

1875.
Total vote polled	3,681
Democratic	2,043
Republican	1,638
Democratic majority	405

Total vote polled	4,496
Democratic	2,905
Republican	1,591
Democratic majority	1,314

It will be seen from the above that the total vote polled in 1876 is 1,416 less than the total number of voters registered. Admitting that the 1,416 voters who failed, or were denied the right to vote were colored men and republicans, still the democratic vote is 1,641 more than the whole number of white men registered, while the republican vote is 1,640, one less than the whole number of votes polled by colored men, thus showing that the votes polled by that number of colored men were counted for the democrats. I am satisfied that not less than one thousand republican tickets, and perhaps two, were taken out of the ballot-boxes before they were counted and the same number of democratic tickets substituted in their stead. This system of fraud and swindling seems to have been inaugurated and successfully carried out in a majority of the republican counties in the State. I have selected five counties in the sixth district only for the purpose of giving an idea as to how the election was conducted throughout the State.

The following is a list of voters registered in the sixth district in 1876. I will state in this connection that the registration was conducted with reasonable fairness in all the counties in the district except Warren and Claiborne. In those two counties not less than 4,000 colored men were denied the privilege of registering.

THE FUTURE OF THE SOUTH.

As I have said on a former occasion, there is, in my judgment, a large element among southern white men who are honestly opposed to revolution, to violence, and to frauds in elections. So far as Mississippi is concerned I know this to be true. The element that supported H. S. Foote for governor as against Jefferson Davis; the element that earnestly opposed the secession of the State, but finally acquiesced in what they believed to be the will of the majority—this element is still strong in that State, but it has never yet been utilized. They have been made to believe that the policy of the republican party is inimical to southern interests, in consequence of which the mass of them have affiliated with an organization which has been the bane of the South for the last quarter of a century. It is to be hoped that the inauguration of a new administration will render possible the utilization of this element and thus prevent the ultimate destruction of that section of our country. If the present lawlessness is allowed to continue; if mob law is allowed to take the place of civil law; if fraud is accepted as the popular method of carrying elections, and violence as the legitimate plan of controlling public opinion, then the decay of that section will necessarily follow. In this connection I will make a quotation from the minority report of Senators BAYARD and MCDONALD, who, as members of a Senate committee, investigated the Mississippi election of 1875, which I cordially indorse:

> Having thus stated the limitations upon the power of Congress, which a respect for the Constitution of our Government and to the decisions of its highest judicial tribunal has dictated, we cannot refrain from an expression of our abhorrence and hearty reprobation of every act of lawless and so often brutal interference with the rights of citizenship which were related by witnesses in our presence.
> Prosperity and happiness can never thrive in a community where such scenes of violence can be enacted without condign punishment. By a law higher than man's the "wages of sin is death," and it will be vain for the people of Mississippi to look for the advancement of their State to that position in the ranks of wealth, influence, and reputation which those who love her would desire to see her occupy, until the spirit of law shall be strengthened and assert itself over the "dangerous classes," who have brought disrepute upon her good name.

The Electoral Count.

REMARKS OF HON. A. S. WILLIAMS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the proceedings of the House upon the electoral count.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire but a few moments to explain my votes against the dilatory motions upon the decisions of the electoral commission made by many of my political friends on this side of the House.

I differ with them with unfeigned reluctance; though among those democrats who vote against these motions I recognize some of the oldest and most experienced of the members of this House.

The law under which we are now acting is entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877."

In the very title of the act and in the body of the law it is made plain that a commission was created to whom all the powers and rights of either or both Houses touching questions of counting the electoral votes should be submitted for consideration and decision, to be final "unless both Houses shall determine otherwise."

I need not recount the circumstances that attended the passage of this law: the threatening and gloomy prospect of irreconcilable differences of opinion between the two Houses as to the constitutional mode of counting the electoral votes; the almost certain result of a declaration of the election of two Presidents, in the excited contest between the two Houses; and the "bloody issue" from this duality of Presidents of a possible civil war and universal anarchy of inconceivable duration and of immeasurable commercial ruin. So general was this feeling of a great impending national calamity that both parties sought with eagerness for a tribunal to which these grave and exciting questions could be safely submitted. A committee of the two Houses, with unlooked-for unanimity, reported the law under which we are now acting, and it secured the votes of democratic members with but one dissenting vote in the Senate and but thirteen, I believe, in this House.

And now, Mr. Speaker, what did we submit to this "electoral commission" by the almost unanimous vote of the democratic party, aided by a very considerable vote of the republican party? We submitted and agreed—

First. That "no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses." In this, we reversed the often-quoted twenty-second joint rule that rejected the vote of a State upon the dissent of either House.

Secondly. We agreed to the indestructibility of the commission as follows:

When the commission shall have been thus organized it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the same or to withdraw any of its members; but if any such Senator or Member shall die or become physically unable to perform the duties required by this act, the fact of such death or physical inability shall be by said commission, before it shall proceed further, communicated to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, which body shall immediately and without debate proceed by viva voce vote to fill the place so vacated, and the person so appointed shall take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed and become a member of said commission; and in like manner, if any of said justices of the Supreme Court shall die or become physically incapable of performing the duties required by this act, the other of said justices, members of the said commission, shall immediately appoint another justice of said court a member of said commission, and in such appointments regard shall be had to the impartiality and freedom from bias sought by the original appointments to said commission, who shall thereupon immediately take and subscribe the oath hereinbefore prescribed and become a member of said commission to fill the vacancy so occasioned.

Thirdly, touching the powers of the commission upon duplicate returns, we stipulated in this act:

When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such States are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern.

Could language make plainer an entire submission of all the powers and duties of both Houses respecting the electoral returns to this joint commission? Not simply of the law, but of the competency and admissibility of proofs under the Constitution and the existing laws. In short, the whole question of "going behind the returning boards," of what is the extent and true construction of the constitutional provision of article 2, section 2:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to, &c.

And of this other provision, much debated:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

All was submitted to the consideration and determination of this joint commission established mainly by democratic votes.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, I can say for myself that in voting for this law I intended by the act to remove from the conflicting opinions and bitter partisan feelings of the two Houses of Congress to a commission of selected members and to the more elevated and disinterested five judges of the Supreme Court, raised as was supposed above the influences and seductions of a partisan character, all the grave questions which seemed incapable of a peaceful solution by the two Houses.

I comprehended, too, that the law was carefully drawn to resist the disappointment of either party and to secure a completion of the duties of the commission that just such a state of feeling as now exists would naturally endanger.

I had a well-grounded belief that a commission selected in accordance with the provisions of this act would look behind the frauds and the perjuries of returning boards, and would determine wisely and honestly what had been the actual and fair vote of the people of the several States. I certainly expected no partisan decisions from judges of the Supreme Court. My disappointment is not less than that of other members on this side of the House.

But granting all the charges brought against this commission to be true, that they have disregarded the law and the Constitution, and followed solely partisan preferences and predilections in their decisions, can I justify myself in ignoring the law which I helped to make? Shall I stand excused while voting for dilatory motions intended practically to nullify a law of Congress, and to place the Government of the Republic in a state of chaotic uncertainty?

What results are to follow a defeat of the decisions of this joint commission? Can we constitutionally or legally declare Mr. Tilden elected? The Constitution provides for an election of the House in a single contingency only, and that is:

If no person have such majority—

Of all the electoral votes—

then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot.

As there were but two candidates voted for by the electoral colleges, it is plain that one or the other had a majority. We claim that Mr. Tilden had that majority, and in so claiming we exclude the possibility of a vote in the House according to the above constitutional provision.

It is plain, therefore, that in defeating the decisions of the commission we remit ourselves to the original contest between the two Houses and its inevitable result—the declaration of a President by each House. We do just what we voted to avoid when with extraordinary unanimity we passed the electoral commission law. We place in jeopardy the peace of the nation. We vote for an internal strife, the end whereof no man can foresee.

Neither my conscience nor my judgment allows me to be a party to such a fatal measure.

I shall therefore continue to vote hereafter as I have done heretofore, against all motions plainly dilatory and intended to obstruct a completion of the presidential count by the commission established by law. I leave it to the people to apply the remedy in future elections, and to award the punishments to the authors of those measureless frauds and iniquities that palpably defeated the will of the people in the late presidential election.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. J. D. C. ATKINS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the electoral bill for the following reasons, as well as others which I have not time to mention:

First. Because the Senate and House of Representatives, under the Constitution, to count the votes for President, have equal powers and therefore must proceed to count conjointly.

Second. Because the two Houses could not agree upon a common rule by which the two bodies in joint convention could proceed in the count, the Senate repealing or abrogating the twenty-second joint rule by which the presidential votes had been counted in 1868 and 1872.

Third. Because the House could not proceed to declare that there was no election without the concurrence of the Senate, and was therefore debarred from the discretion and exercise of its constitutional prerogatives to elect the President in the contingency provided for in the Constitution.

Fourth. Because it is not denied anywhere, or by anybody, that the Senate intended to count the republican candidate into office in the event that the two Houses did not agree upon a plan of counting the vote.

Fifth. Because this plan seemed to present the only showing or chance whatever for the will of the people as expressed at the polls, on the 7th of November, to be respected in the count.

Sixth. Because this bill is constitutional, and was believed to be the only plan which could meet the approval of each House of Congress.

Seventh. Because the mode adopted, if fairly and justly executed, would give satisfaction to the people; avoid the danger of civil commotion, perhaps war, and effect the ends of peace and justice.

Eighth. Because it promised a solution of the presidential issue which relieved the republican party from an act of audacious usurpation and the democratic party from submission or a resort to arms.

Now, for these patriotic reasons, besides others I need not mention, I voted for the electoral bill. Only eighteen democratic Representatives and one democratic Senator voted against the bill; all the rest, except a few absentees, voted for it.

The whole democratic and conservative press of the country approved it. The people everywhere seemed to rejoice that Congress had agreed to a plan of adjustment.

Everywhere the sentiment was proclaimed that a seat on the commission would inspire even the veriest partisan with a feeling of justice and a profound sense of responsibility. But of the members of that commission selected from the supreme bench every one almost joined in the opinion that they would hold the scales of justice, law, and truth evenly. To have predicted that any member of the judicial part of that commission would have fallen short in his investigation of this great issue, upon which the rights of all the people depend, by bringing out the truth in all its beauty and loveliness on the one hand, or upon the other of exposing fraud and corruption in all their hideous deformity, would have shocked the sensibilities of the public heart.

Hear what the Senator from Vermont said in advocating the electoral bill before the Senate, keeping in mind too that he was a member of a joint committee that reported the bill and subsequently became one of the commission. After reading the oath which the members of the commission were required to take, he said:

> No more partisan, no more friend, no more opponent, no more enemy, but the solemn judgment of the judge. It appeared to us, Mr. President, that, so far as human institutions can provide for justice under the law, to impose upon five of ourselves, five of the gentlemen of the House of Representatives, and five of these eminent persons in the judicial branch to whom I have referred, that obligation, which each willingly and affirmatively takes, would be to dismiss, with us even, with all the warmth of our wishes, every consideration that should cither cloud our intellects or warp our judgments; for what this commission is to decide is not a policy; it is not a future; it is only to pass upon the irrevocable past and to say, as an intellectual answer to the question under the Constitution and the law, and in no other sense and in no other way, what has taken place according to the Constitution, and not what ought to take place or what they could have wished should take place. I repeat, sir, that if there be any value left in the institutions of civil government under law, this is the last and final hope that such institutions can have. There is no human agency, there is nothing short of the overruling providence of the Almighty, that can furnish a juster test of human rights than this.

But, sir, what is our shame to-day? Here we have the spectacle of eight distinguished men instead of acting as conscientious judges we see them playing the rôle of violent and reckless partisans, ignoring the merits of the questions submitted to their arbitrament, refusing to hear testimony in Florida and Louisiana, where the evidence would unmistakedly show that the democratic electors were elected by from five to eight thousand majority, while in other cases reversing their own decisions as associate justices and reversing their own decisions as members of this commission where such inconsistency and self-contradiction would operate in favor of the republican candidate. In the case of Louisiana indorsing the audacious and villainous proceedings of an illegal and unconstitutional returning board, composed of two illiterate negroes and two desperate and abandoned white men, who, the proof shows, were ready to sell the electoral vote of Louisiana for money and who, it is not denied by any honest man, committed the vilest frauds and perpetrated the most flagitious crimes in the exercise of the functions of their office.

If the Louisiana returning board deserves (as no sincere man will deny) to be held up to the withering scowl, indignation, and contempt of all honest and fair-minded men, what will the enlightened civilization of this country and of Europe think of the eight members of that commission who indorse the results of their falsehood, treachery, and fraud? And who can respect the chief beneficiary of all this crime and corruption? Who can draw a line of distinction between the conduct of the Louisiana returning board, the commission, and the individual who consents to accept the highest office in the gift of the American people, when he knows that he was not elected to it by the people, but has obtained it through those instrumentalities of deception, illegality, and fraudulent and partisan ruling at which a Jeffries or a Norbury would blush. This conduct brings the tinge of shame to every American citizen's cheek. Not having lost faith in human nature, I felt that at least there was one repository for justice, truth, and honor which the deterioration in the public morals had not yet reached; one fountain of public administration yet uncorrupted—the judiciary!—the Supreme Court of the United States. But, alas, that fancied security proved an illusion! Who, now, will reverence the decisions of a Miller, a Strong, or a Bradley?

Sir, the fault of this plan does not lie in the law creating this commission but in the eight recreant men who swore to be impartial, non-partisan, and just. The law is a good one if executed fairly. Of course it is beyond the power of human ken to have looked into the hearts of these men and read them as they are; the life-tenure of three of them, their distinguished office, their associations, and all that consecrates and hallows this life would have impressed the world with their fairness; but, oh, how sad the disappointment! An unjust judge! Who can fathom the depth of his depravity? Who can measure the height of his folly or span the breadth of his disgrace? He stands out alone, ab ndoned and unapproached in the wilderness of human contempt, shelterless, unpitied, despised; fit only for association with the damned.

This crowning wrong of the country inflicted upon the liberties of the people, this national robbery of the people's franchise enriches the few audacious conspirators who appropriate the emoluments of office, but tends to undermine the public confidence in free government and degrades the national authority in the minds of the honest citizens. It forces many of the masses of the republican voters to indorse the infamous usurpation through fear of the scorpian lash of a domineering and unscrupulous partyism. Hundreds of thousands of them, however, who are too honest to indorse fraud, and who are too brave and decent to follow the hybrid banner borne by Wells and Casanave, assisted by the eight recreants of the commission and the army of radical office-holders and hungry expectants, with Rutherford B. Hayes in their lead, with the blush of conscious guilt mantling his cheek, and his eyes cast upon the ground, will forever turn their backs upon a party which owes it success to fraud, falsehood, conspiracy, illegality, and to the patience of the people, wounded by wrong and insult, but yet so patriotic and so loyal to peace and to the forms of law, that they wisely wait for a redress of grievances at the ballot-box.

Many speculations are being just now indulged in as to the future status of parties. Golden promises have doubtless been offered and bright visions of auspicious fortune have been portrayed upon the political canvass of southern expectancy with the hope of seducing the people from their integrity and their devotion to the principles of constitutional liberty so long emblazoned upon the banner of the democracy. Foreign missions, cabinet places, judgeships, and bounties are liberally spoken of by the avant-coureurs of the new règime. These messengers of good news, now so thickly whirling in the political atmosphere, without weight or any uniform direction, are like the motion of the leaves of the forest, which float conspicuously upon the circumambient currents of the air just before the arrival of the tornado, when, in the twinkling of an eye, they mount the storm and are scattered into nothingness. The moderate men of Mr. Hayes's friends delude themselves into the belief that he will adopt a just and constitutional policy toward the prostrate States of South Carolina and Louisiana. These are the fitful gales which precede the storm. Why did the republicans of this House vote against recognizing the Nicholls and Hampton governments of South Carolina and Louisiana? The men of iron will and of unscrupulous intent who originated the plan of the conspiracy, and whose executive audacity have well-nigh consummated its success, although not in the manner originally conceived, which was by the daring assumption of supreme control on the part of the Senate, but through corrupt judges and partisans, although now in the background, will as soon as all danger of mishap is passed move forward to the front and engineer the creature they have made. Why should they not? They made him.

A President created by such men, while he is nominally at the head of a government, he yet has no more control than the weak and purposeless princes we read of in history who are oftentimes operated and managed by powerful and wicked ministers, who have rendered the reigns of such sovereigns the bloodiest and most revengeful on record. Mr. Hayes will be at the head of his administration it is true, but he is like an engineer chained to a weak and feeble locomotive to which is attached an immense train, behind which huge engines are driven, impelling by their superior force and power the entire train madly and wildly on to destruction, even though the chief should interpose his ineffectual resistance. No Cassandra forebodings inspire my anticipations. If these predictions are not the logical conclusions of the events recently and now about to transpire, then must effect cease to follow cause.

If the mailed hand of Federal power is intended by the republican administration now so anxiously and nervously expected to be loosened from its iron grip upon the freedom of the people of two States, and of the whole South so far as the principle is concerned, why not agree to remove the Army at once and allow the people to elect their own rulers in their own way, under the Constitution of the United States? No; these are delusive promises to smooth the present difficulties and relieve apprehensions which naturally spring up in the mind of broken faith and conscious guilt.

These overtures are already growing weaker, if we are to judge of them from the insolence again beginning to assert itself as the hour of victory approaches. The same mad rule of hate, revenge, and cupidity crops out of the very indicia of the future policy.

If the southern people would surrender their manhood, pride of character, and political convictions, and en masse link themselves to the car of radicalism, they might enjoy a season of prosperity under the lavish system of bounties, subsidies, largesses, and offices of which rumor has spoken so industriously of late. But it would only be temporary; the relief would only be such as debauchery produces: a stupefaction of the sensibilities and a numbness of the entire organs of the body-politic. However gilded the slavery, there can be no real relief to a proud man, through whose veins courses the ancient and heroic blood of the Anglo-Saxon race, if he is not allowed to live in a government based upon the consent of the governed, that memorable principle canonized by the blood of the Revolution in which Washington fought and Montgomery fell. No, sir. The noble and genuine people of the South will accept no favors of governmental aid of whatever description which propose a bargain and sale of their honor, manhood, and political convictions. I do not believe that any man of prominence from the South has entertained the thought. If there is, I will suggest one thing: bargain and sale is one thing, delivery is quite another.

That the South needs and should receive a more liberal and enlightened consideration by the General Government in her system of internal improvements and material development than she has received from either party is not to be denied; but she cannot afford to sell herself for a price. The South is not so craven and selfish, so lost to pride and manhood as to be willing to barter her love of pure government for even the most splendid material and commercial advantages, coupled with slavery however gilded. Until the heel of the oppressor is removed from her bowed neck and she stands once more proudly erect, she will scorn an alliance with any men or party that does not acknowledge her equality in the Union.

Mr. Speaker, this national melodrama, the last acts of which will soon transpire, has left strewn upon its boards many wrecks which the slowly descending curtain of time can never hide from the searching gaze of an outraged and deeply wronged people. These broken images of national honor, public justice, judicial fairness, and sacred truth which lie scattered in wild confusion, the booty of iconoclastic hands, will, when these actors, when this generation shall sleep with its fathers and unborn millions shall occupy our places, stand upon the faithful page of history as monuments of the greatest crime that ever blackened the annals of mankind. They will mark a place and an era in our country's history which the patriot will ever seek to avoid; like the pillar of salt in the land of Sodom, they will ever point the traveler to a time, and a place, and to a character which the scorching eye of God will blast as with the breath of his curses, seven times hotter than a furnace. Let us draw black lines around this page of our history; nay, for the honor of our common country, is there no hope that the historian will expunge it from the record of our annals and leave a blank that shall forever excite the curiosity of posterity?

But amid all these wrecks of ruin there stands conspicuous one central figure clothed with the drapery of hideous night, with not one ray of light relieving the darkness that envelops its ungainly proportions. 'Tis the mind and heart and soul of an unjust judge, in ruins.

Travelers tell us, in wandering through the imperial seven-hilled city, of various objects of interest, in the long ages ago, which now lie in scattered fragments; but when they approach the spot where stands in crumbling ruins the once-renowned coliseum, within whose halls the voices of patriotism and eloquence charmed the listening ears of conscript fathers and amid whose regal courts and from whose learned bench emanated the great principles of law and justice which have come down to us through hoary centuries, and to-day form the pedestal upon which English and American jurisprudence rests, they pause and, silently gazing upon that ancient monument of human hope, fame, power, learning, and aspiration, wonder:

And can it be,
That this is all that's left of thee?

Sir, when I look upon the scenes of this hour and feel the pulsations of an honest and intelligent constituency throbbing in my own heart, sympathizing with their bitter disappointment and sharing their unutterable contempt for the petty legal subterfuges and technical decisions intended to cover up a mighty fraud, and when seeing that the American judiciary, the last hope and bulwark of free government, (save in the people themselves) becomes the apex of this monument of wickedness, I ask:

And can it be,
That this is all that's left of thee?

Amid all these wrecks of former greatness and public virtue the cause of democracy, of the people, although defeated, need not despair. If the people have been betrayed let us democratic Representatives, who claim to represent the people, not forget that our cause is the cause of law and order. It has not been deemed best by those who are the chosen leaders to resort to other than peaceful remedies. Let us remember that our mission is to save, not to ruin our country, although the democratic party for a time is cheated out of a great victory and out of their political rights.

In the present uncertainty of the powers of Congress under the Constitution, and the divergent views of democratic statesmen of unquestioned patriotism and admitted ability, we are brought up squarely to the point whether we shall abide this unrighteous decision or seek to overthrow it without further legislation providing against admitted defects in our system. For myself, I would gladly now, as I would three months ago, cling to any proposition, legal and constitutional, which would eliminate the country from this extraordinary embarrassment and insure the triumph of the right, believing as I do that we as a party or as representatives owe these violations of the spirit and letter of the law of the electoral commission no respect, but absolute contempt. But I can see no positive relief ahead as yet, no mode that furnishes absolute and certain escape. But that some opportunity might present itself I have not felt it to be my duty to vote for motions urging forward and hastening the consummation of this gigantic crime, but have uniformly voted for time to consider each phase of the case as it presents itself.

Let no man tell me that honor binds me to carry legislation into effect by my voice or vote to accomplish and complete this perfidious and treacherous result. I owe a party and a commission that would be guilty of such punic faith, nothing. My restraints and obligations have no reference to Hayes and his confederates in fraud. To be plain, nothing but anarchy and civil war at the last moment would compel me to recognize the result now being forced upon the country by an unfair and partisan tribunal; hence I hold myself ready and willing to assume the responsibility of a new election if both Houses can agree. And I also prefer to see (if the Senate will not concur with the House that no election has been made by the electoral college, in which event the House would elect) the President of the Senate become the President of the United States by virtue of his office, which Congress can yet provide for under the Constitution, if not already the law. Such a President would, although not chosen by the people directly, be free from the objection of being counted in by fraud and inaugurated by force. This talk of observing faith with faithless men, of maintaining honor with dishonorable men, of executing contracts with law-breakers, is like paying a forfeit upon your life extorted at the mouth of a pistol by a highwayman after he has become your captive. No, sir; I want the world to know that I repudiate the repudiators of the law and the rights of the people in this case if I can find the mode of escape which will not leave us to battle with greater ills than those we have.

These are momentous times, and great events crowd close upon each other. The responsibility is not all on one side. The frauds and usurpations of our political opponents impose new and trying responsibilities upon the democratic party almost each revolving day if we would successfully battle for the country's weal. But should injustice triumph through artful chicanery and audacious fraud, we may not recover in many years the partial vantage-ground which law and order was slowly gaining since the throes of our late civil war.

I cannot, I will not by my acts, leave the country without a Chief Executive. Anybody is better than nobody. The sacred behests of civilization, and all the varied and complicated interests of this age of human progress and scientific development, forbid that we should leave the vessel of state without a helmsman. I cannot look upon a disrupted government, its central vitality destroyed and its different members thrown from their centripetal attraction, abandoned and floating out upon the shoreless sea of anarchy, without fear and trembling. Southern democrats will unite with northern democrats in rallying around the flag of our common country. If there be no other alternative but to yield to this usurpation, four years, Mr. Speaker, may be a long time with you and me, but it is as a day in a nation's life-time. The moral grandeur of the democratic party in this moment of perplexing trial will command the admiration of all good men, and this manly evidence of patriotic virtue will stand for them a witness before the bar of posterity when the conspirators and returning boards and electoral commissioners will have sunken beneath Lethe's dark waves to rise no more forever.

Mr. Speaker, in all the vicissitudes and mutations of this dark and damning transaction I have been guided by the best lights my judgment afforded as to what is the path of duty, of law, and of the Constitution, and in that path I have endeavored faithfully to tread. And when the excitement and passion which now holds high carnival in this Federal Capitol shall subside, and this arbitrament is submitted, as submitted it must be, to the grand inquest of the people, these iniquitous conspirators, covered with the spoils of ill-gotten place, and puffed with the insolence of office to which they were never lawfully chosen, will, like the finally impenitent, pray for the rocks and the mountains to fall upon them and hide them from the eyes of men, and, if possible, from the scorching gaze of the Eternal.

Successful wrong may flourish for a while, and rejoicing and exultation may swell the chorus of these usurpers for a season; even partisan congratulations will be extended to the miserable agents whose treachery and corruption has procured this result; but the day is coming when an enlightened and virtuous public sentiment will spurn the actors in this crime and drive them into perpetual and blasting ostracism.

Texas Pacific Railroad.

SPEECH OF J. W. THROCKMORTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the views which I desire to submit in favor of the bill reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad I wish to refer to insinuations contained in some of the newspapers of this city, that the action of friends of the measure on questions arising in the House on the subject of the presidential count has been influenced by collusion with the friends of the republican candidate for the Presidency. These insinuations have been made in face of the undeniable fact that some of the most ardent supporters of the count under the electoral law are uncompromisingly opposed to the Texas and Pacific bill, while on the other hand some of the leading supporters of the measure are most resolutely and persistently opposing the continuance of the count. Without further observation I desire to pronounce such insinuations, from whatever quarter they may come, affecting the friends of this measure who are members of this body, as utterly false and atrociously slanderous.

Mr. Speaker, it would scarcely be too much to say that this House has had but few measures before it during the present session of greater importance to the material interests of the whole country than the one which I propose to discuss.

Whether viewed as a measure for the especial benefit of that section of the Union, the industries and commerce of which are still prostrate from the effects of a long and desolating civil war, or as a measure for the benefit of the whole country, its importance cannot but command the serious attention of every member of this body.

The restoration to prosperity of a large and important section of our country can scarcely be a matter of indifference even to the most sectional and selfish; for whatever may be the political differences and social antipathies between the people of the different sections of the Union, we are so closely connected in our business relations that the prostration of the industries and trade of one important part of the country cannot but injuriously affect the well-being of the whole.

You cannot desolate Louisiana and South Carolina without the people of New York and Massachusetts sympathizing, perhaps as fellow-citizens of the same great Republic, certainly as fellow-sufferers from a common calamity.

Upon a prosperous South and West depend a prosperous North and East. Let the cotton and sugar fields of the South no longer yield support to the cultivators of the soil and tens of thousands of toilers in northern manufacturies will go home to cheerless hearthstones. Let the South cease to produce that which her people can exchange for the manufactured fabrics of the North and East and both sections will be alike injured. Let a blight fall upon the grain fields of the great Northwest and California, or the mines of Colorado and Nevada cease to yield the precious metals, or let their products be cut off from the markets for want of the means of transportation, and the whole money system of the country feels the shock, and bankers and capitalists and merchants with their millions go down with a crash that spreads ruin throughout the length and breadth of the land.

The lesson thus taught proves that no considerable section of this great country can long enjoy a high degree of prosperity while any other important section languishes in poverty.

I know of no effort of statesmanship better calculated to restore prosperity to the entire country than to build up the waste places in the South, and give to her the prosperity which she once enjoyed and which she still deserves. In my judgment there is no measure we can consider that will more effectually secure that prosperity than the one under consideration.

Give the South just laws, treat her as an equal of the North, of the East, and West; let her have a fair proportion of the protection, the benefits and bounties conferred by the Government, and the result will be that the renewed life and vigor thus given will add ten fold to her production, ten-fold to her consumption of northern fabrics and western produce; the wealth of the nation will be greatly increased, a new era of prosperity will begin, and the balance of trade will turn in our favor.

The bill reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, granting Government credit to aid in the construction of a southern transcontinental railway, has been printed and laid on each member's desk; and I trust that members will give its provisions careful consideration and not permit themselves to be influenced in their judgment of its merits by prejudice or preconceived ideas, inculcated by newspapers that have made war on the measure without understanding its scope or intention, or by rival interests that are determined there shall be no southern line to the Pacific Ocean.

The very able and interesting report of the chairman of the committee presents so strongly and clearly the main features of the measure that I deem it unnecessary to weary the patience of the House by a recapitulation of them. But, sir, before proceeding with my argument, I cannot forbear referring to some of the objections that have been urged to the proposition submitted by the committee, and I earnestly invoke the attention of my southern friends, and those of the North who may be disposed to lend us a helping hand, to the answer I shall make to these objections.

Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised and astonished to hear the charge made that the measure as presented in this bill is not for the benefit of the South, but that its object is to build up the interests of northern commerce. Nothing more absolutely untrue could be stated. This not a southern measure, with already two completed connections with Galveston, and the third under construction; with branches to New Orleans, Vicksburgh, and Memphis; these branches and connections to enjoy all the advantages of freights and fares possessed by the main line! This not a measure for the benefit of the South, when eight hundred miles of its main line and three hundred miles of its "transcontinental branch" lie in Texas, and six hundred and ninety-three miles of the branches traverse Arkansas and Louisiana, making a grand total of seventeen hundred and ninety-three miles of railway constructed or to be constructed within these three great cotton-producing States, and which will when completed connect with the entire railroad system throughout the South!

But, sir, this charge is made because of the Vinita connection with Saint Louis. It originates in a quarter that never has been friendly to southern interests, and I regret that some southern gentlemen have been led astray by it. The representatives of the various interests opposed to the construction of a southern transcontinental line have been the circulators of this absurd charge. Now, sir, let us see what foundation there is for such a statement. Of course, transcontinental commerce would avail itself of the Vinita branch, but only such of it as would be best accommodated by taking the route to and from Saint Louis. That city has already two connections with the main line, one at Sherman and the other at Texarkana; so that any one can see that should the Vinita branch never be constructed it would require a run of only a few hours longer to reach Saint Louis.

Again, sir, does not every man of ordinary intelligence comprehend that commerce has her own laws, and that trade and travel invariably use the shortest and least expensive available routes? Without the Vinita branch it cannot be doubted that northern trade would avail itself of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway from Sherman, Texas, to Saint Louis, and of the Iron Mountain Railroad from Texarkana. But would it be just to force this trade and travel over the longer line, when no interest could be subserved except that of the railroad companies transporting it? No southern city or port could reap the slightest benefit by forcing such commerce out of its most direct line. It is the object of this measure to lessen the burdens of commerce. The supposition that the owners and managers of eleven or twelve hundred miles of railway in Texas would, contrary to their own interest, turn transcontinental traffic away from their own line for the benefit of the Vinita branch and Saint Louis, is too monstrous to be treated otherwise than with derision. Hence, the assertion that the Vinita branch robs this measure of its claim to southern, favor is a fallacy too absurd for patient or respectful consideration.

But there are other considerations, in connection with the Vinita branch, that ought not to be forgotten. It should be remembered that Congress has passed laws to encourage, by donations of lands, a road from the northern lakes to the Pacific Ocean, with a right to branches, with a land grant of 45,000,000 acres. It has also endowed the Union and Central Pacific, and their numerous branches, with land grants of more than fifty million acres, and with more than $53,000,000 in bonds. It has also bestowed upon the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company 42,000,000 acres of land to aid in the construction of a road on the thirty-fifth parallel, and granted lands to the amount of 18,000,000 acres to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company. These several acts were passed in the interest of the various sections of our widely extended country, and were thought to be just to the extreme north, to the extreme south, and to the people interested in the intermediate lines of the thirty-fifth and fortieth parallels respectively. So that we find the Atlantic and the Pacific, or the thirty-fifth parallel route, by the provisions of the bill under consideration, surrenders its claim to more than forty-one millions of acres of land, as the consideration for a Government guarantee of the interest upon the cost of constructing three hundred and twenty-five miles of railway; a line, for its length, of more importance to the Government than any other on the continent, and a line of more value to Texas than any of the other branches. Its construction would give peace to her northern border and render valuable her multiplied millions of acres of land that have been dedicated to her common schools, and populate a portion of her territory, now entirely uninhabited, larger than the State of New York; besides affording the shortest and nearest route to northern markets for the beef-cattle that will be produced on her western plains.

Then, sir, in the interest of the whole country, in the interest of the Government, and especially as a representative from Texas, in her interest, do I favor this Vinita branch. I regret that there is not provided for in this bill a shorter and more direct connection with Galveston, which was attempted to be secured in committee, and which I still hope to see adopted by the House. But if I should be disappointed in this reasonable and just expectation, I cannot afford to do my section and my State, as well as the whole country, an incalculable wrong and injury by opposing the main proposition. We of Texas are not selfish with regard to this measure, and would be content with the main line without the branches. But how can we deny the reasonable demands of commerce and our southern neighbors for the outlets provided for in this bill?

Who is there, acquainted with the facts, that does not know that with our present railroads and water connections the trade and production of Texas alone are unable to be accommodated? For many weeks during the present season, with our outlets to Galveston and other Gulf ports by several lines of railway, to New Orleans by Red River, to Memphis, and Saint Louis by the Iron Mountain and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroads, our products have been kept from market and return freights delayed in like manner. What would the condition be, with a through line to the Pacific, with the vast increase of population and production which would be superinduced by such a work? How extremely unstatesmanlike, then, would it be to arrest that commerce while waiting for the uncertain navigation of Red River, or make it dependent upon the unregulated rates imposed by the Texas Central, the Iron Mountain, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroads, which are now unable to do the local traffic. These considerations are so important that none who weigh them can fail to appreciate their force. To my mind, at least, they present a complete justification for the cordial support I shall give to all the branches.

Having answered these objections, I proceed at once to the consideration of the bill, and inquire—

Is there a necessity for this action on the part of Congress? To show that such necessity exists it is only necessary to state a few facts so apparent, when mentioned, as to fasten conviction upon the most casual observer.

First. The Vinita branch traverses the whole extent of the Indian Territory from its northeast to its southwest corner. In this Territory are situated large numbers of Indians for which you have recently appropriated large sums for transportation alone.

Second. The main line traverses nearly a thousand miles of the most exposed portions of the frontiers of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, now infested by the most treacherous of all the Indian tribes, and least accessible to the operations of the Army, and in a region, where more depredations have been committed by the Indians during the last ten years, than in all the other Territories and borders of the Government combined.

Third. Along the line of the proposed road and tributary to it, the Government for years past has maintained more than forty military posts, garrisoned by nearly one-half of the entire Army, where supplies for both Indians and troops have to be transported long distances, at great cost and much risk, by wagons.

Fourth. One thousand miles of the line runs directly along and near to the territory of a foreign government, whose people are constantly depredating upon the citizens and the property of the citizens of this Government.

Fifth. We have the very best military authority indorsing the construction of a transcontinental railroad as among the surest and best means of settling our Indian troubles.

Sixth. Outside of these considerations, if a necessity exists for the Government each succeeding year to make large appropriations to clean out rivers, improve harbors, and erect light-houses for the benefit of trade and commerce between the States and with foreign countries, is there not a like necessity to do something for the transcontinental commerce of the nation, the inland commerce between the States of the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, and the trade and commerce of the Territories of the Government?

Because some of the States and Territories have no harbors and no navigable streams, although they have immense productions for export and for exchange with other States and great demand for the fabrics and products of sister-States, are they to be denied the protecting care and support of the Government?

Look at Texas, larger than the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, and Maryland, with an extent and fertility of soil capable of producing (without interfering with her large production of wheat, barley, oats, corn, sugar, mules, horses, cattle, and sheep) more cotton, if she had the labor and transportation to get it to market, than is produced in all other countries to-day. Is she to be taxed to aid in clearing out the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Missouri, and other streams, and to pay principal and interest on the Union Pacific and California Central and other railroad bonds because she has no navigable waters to which you can make annual appropriations? Are New Mexico and Arizona and Nevada and Utah to be denied all aid from the Government to foster and promote their commerce because they have been denied by nature navigable rivers? Is the commerce of China and Japan, of the Indies and Australia, that desires to seek transit across our territory to our own ports or to Europe, and the trade of our own States and Territories to be forever subject to the exactions of one great monopoly, over which Congress seems to have no control; or shall American statesmanship strike off the galling shackles that now fetter it, by passing this measure and give to this great and growing commerce an open highway over which Congress may at all times exercise an undisputed and healthy ontrol?

Then, sir, may I not insist that, in a military point of view, there is a necessity for this work?

As the speediest solution of the Indian troubles is there not a necessity for it?

As a measure of economy in the transportation of troops, munitions, and supplies to the Army and the Indians, is it not an absolute want?

For the speedy and safe transmission of your mails, is it not demanded?

Do not the protection and promotion of commerce between the States and in the Territories and between our ports and the ports of foreign governments both justify and require it?

Having thus shown the necessity for the work, the next question that naturally presents itself to the mind is as to sufficiency of the security to the Government for the liabilities it will assume should this bill become a law. If it cannot be established that this security is ample beyond any possible contingency, I should be as far from according it my support as any gentleman on this floor. I ask your special attention to this branch of the subject, for herein, so far as the claim for governmental aid is concerned, in my judgment, lies the gist of the whole subject; for whatever may be shown to be the advantages the construction of the proposed railroads might confer on the people of the country; whatever may be the abstract justice of the demands of the South for an equal share in the benefactions of the General Government, in aid of great works of internal improvement, a due regard for the obligations we owe the people to husband the resources of the Government wisely and prudently would demand that this bill should be rejected if it cannot be clearly shown that the security offered is ample to protect the Government against the possibility of loss.

The entire length of the proposed road upon which interest-guaranteed bonds are asked will be as follows: Main, or trunk line, from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, 1,187 miles; from near San Gorgonio Pass to San Diego, 100 miles; the eastern extension to New Orleans, Vicksburgh, Memphis, and Saint Louis, 1,018 miles. Upon these different sections bonds are to be issued for the purpose of construction, only for the actual cost of the work, but not to exceed $35,000 per mile for the trunk or main line; $30,000 per mile for the San Diego connection, and $25,000 per mile for the eastern extensions to the Mississippi. From this it results that the whole issue for the purposes of construction would be $41,545,000 for the main line, $3,000,000 for the San Diego connection, and $25,450,000 for the eastern extensions; making a total of $69,995,000, the interest upon which, at 5 per cent., would amount to $3,499,750 per annum, or $1,750, $1,500, and $1,250 per mile on the respective roads. But if you assume that the $5,000 per mile additional issue, authorized by the bill, should be included in this estimate, the total of bonds would be $81,520,000, upon which the annual interest would be $4,077,000. But as the Government holds these additional bonds merely as a further security, of course, they draw no interest until sold by the Government, after the other securities have proved to be insufficient to meet the interest obligations of the companies. I shall show, I hope conclusively, that the other securities are sufficiently ample to meet these obligations, and consequently that these bonds will never draw interest or become a liability to the Government.

Now, sir, what security is offered for the Government's guarantee and liability? In reply, I answer—

First. It will hold a first mortgage, as the roads are constructed, on the roads, equipment, and all the property of the companies.

Second. The Government is to receive and retain the entire proceeds of the sales of lands of the companies granted by the General Government and so much of the land granted by the State of Texas as is given for the road to be constructed west of Fort Worth, say about 7,500,000 acres.

Third. The Government is to retain in the Treasury all dues to the companies for the transportation of troops, munitions, supplies, &c., and for postal and telegraph service.

Fourth. Such part of the earnings of the road from general traffic as may be necessary to meet interest and sinking fund.

Fifth. There are also to be retained in the Treasury bonds of the companies to the amount of $5,000 per mile, to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of any current interest or sinking fund the companies may have failed to provide for.

These securities are so ample, to protect the Government against loss, that the mere enumeration of them would seem sufficient to relieve the most skeptical mind from doubt; but, I beg the attention of the House for a few moments, during which I shall endeavor to show beyond question their entire sufficiency.

As to the first security, can any one doubt that a railroad property costing twenty-five, thirty, or thirty-five thousand dollars per mile, and the real value of which is equal to the cost, is not sufficient to secure a liability of twelve hundred and fifty, fifteen hundred, or seventeen hundred and fifty, or even two thousand dollars per mile? More especially is it to be considered that these proposed railroad lines pass through sections of country of the most favored climate and fertility of soil, capable of producing the very largest crops of cotton, the cereals, tobacco, fruits, and vegetables, and abundantly able to sustain a population more dense than now inhabits the New England States.

Such is the country through which the extensions pass in Arkansas, Louisiana, the Indian Territory, and for four hundred miles of the main line from Texarkanna via Marshall to the Colorado River of Texas. The remainder of the main line in Texas will pass through the finest natural pasturage in the whole country, where the buffalo in all time past, in countless numbers from the Rocky Mountains and northern plains, have resorted in winter to subsist.

When the Indians cease to depredate in that section it will be indeed what it is now fast becoming, the great beef-producing region of this continent. Its outlet to the markets of southern cities, the valley of the Mississippi, and to the cities of the North and East, with such speedy transportation as to prevent its deterioration, will be over the Vinita branch, main line, and eastern extensions, thus affording the best and cheapest meat, for the consumption of the rich and poor, that the country can produce.

In proof of the value of railroad property in Texas, where we have scarcely a navigable stream, I need only refer you to the following table, showing Galveston to be the second largest cotton-receiving city in the United States, second only to New Orleans, outstripping Savannah and largely ahead of Charleston and Norfolk.

RECEIPTS AT ALL UNITED STATES PORTS.

Last year	15,474	92,338	3,291,272

This table is taken from the Galveston News, a reliable and accurate journal, and is made out for the present season, up to a recent date in the last month. It does not show the amount of cotton shipped from Brownsville, Corpus Christi, Matagorda Bay, the mouths of the Brazos and Sabine Rivers, or direct from Houston, from Shreveport, from Jefferson; or that which finds its way north and to Memphis via Texarkana, where but recently 50,000 bales were passed from the Texas Pacific to the Iron Mountain Road in the space of twenty days; nor from Denison, where an equal, if not greater, amount finds its outlet to the North and East. It is safe to say that this season's cotton product in Texas will foot up from 650,000 to 700,000 bales, worth at the moderate price of $50 per bale, from $32,000,000 to $35,000,000. What will it be in ten years, when our present population shall be doubled and we have cheap and speedy transportation for our products to the markets of the world?

As a further evidence of the value of the railroad properties proposed to be encouraged and given as a security to the Government by this bill, it may be stated that since the war there has been an average of about four hundred thousand head of cattle driven and shipped from the State. With the extension of the main trunk and Vinita branch to the northern and western plains of Texas, this profitable traffic would inure very largely to these lines.

But to give positive proof as to the earnings of railroads in Texas, I submit the showing of the Texas and Pacific earnings upon three hundred and twenty-five miles of constructed road, which for the year ending June 30, 1876, are as follows:

RECEIPTS.
Transportation	$1,540,418 82
Express service	12,592 99
Mail service	30,794 74
Telegraph service	8,491 11
Incidental	2,858 44
Total receipts	1,595,156 10
EXPENSES.
Transportation	539,026 51
Maintenance	310,344 76
General expenses	45,323 17
Total expenses	894,694 44

leaving net earnings, $700,461.66.

I also submit the following statement as to the Houston and Texas Central Railroad Company, on a constructed line of five hundred and five miles of road:

Gross earnings, $6,262 per mile	$3,162,518 22
Expenses, 59.60 per cent	1,885,196 89
Net earnings, $2,529 per mile	1,277,321 33

As compared with 1875, the net earnings show an increase of $133,395.68, or 11.7 per cent. The interest on the bonded debt was $950,000, leaving a surplus of $327,321.33. During the year the company changed the gauge of one hundred and twenty miles of the main line from 5 feet 6 inches to 4 feet 8½ inches, and added eight engines and two hundred freight-cars to the equipment. The net earnings of four hundred and forty-two miles of the Texas and Pacific road for the six months ending January 1, 1877, were at the average rate of $85,000 per month or at the annual rate of $2,307 per mile.

And still further, to prove that the investment for the construction of these lines would be a profitable one, and that the Government would be secured, I mention the fact that thirty-three counties in the State of Texas, averaging largely more than nine hundred square miles to the county, and all that portion of the State west of the one hundredth meridian, and extending from the Rio Grande north to the Kansas boundary, would be almost entirely dependent upon the Texas and Pacific and the Vinita branch for commercial facilities. It is worthy of consideration that these thirty-three counties are among the most inviting for settlement and production of any in our whole State. It is not going beyond the truth to assert that for beauty of scenery of mountain, hill, and dale; crystal flowing waters, beautiful valleys, and broad rolling plains, the country alluded to has no superior on this continent. It is within the bounds of truth to say that two-thirds of the soil is of the richest and most productive character, easily brought into cultivation, and which, if properly cultivated in cotton, at an average yield of a half bale per acre would produce 6,336,000 bales per annum, being 1,776,000 bales more than the entire crop of the United States for 1875 and 1876. Or if the same amount of land was cultivated in wheat, with an average yield of fifteen bushels per acre—a moderate estimate for that region—we should have the enormous amount of 190,080,000 bushels per annum; which, at the rate of three hundred and fifty bushels to the car, and twenty cars to the train, and twenty-four trains a day, would require eleven hundred and thirty days and nights to transport the crop of a single year to market.

Or, if cultivated in cotton alone, making the same calculation of the same number of cars to the train, and one train for every hour of the day and night, it would require three hundred and twenty-four days and eight hours to move such a crop to market. In other words, it would require over three years to move one season's wheat crop, and nearly one year to move the cotton crop.

This, sir, is no fanciful picture. To make it a reality all that is requisite is such a population as the country described can easily support, and the means of transportation for its products.

As a matter of course, it would not be desirable to cultivate so much soil in any one crop, nor would it be done; but this presentation will show the capacity of the country for production, and its cultivation in a variety of crops would yield the same results as to freight for transportation.

This embraces no account of the agricultural products, live stock, or other traffic to be furnished by the great area of territory, at least one hundred thousand square miles in extent, west of the one hundredth meridian and between the Rio Grande and the Kansas border, which would be dependent upon the proposed lines for an outlet to market.

By reference, Mr. Speaker, to the last report of the Secretary of the Interior, we find that the net earnings of the Union Pacific and California Central Pacific Railroads for the current year amount to the large sum of $14,386,626.03; or, upon a line 1,913 miles in length from Omaha to San Francisco, that these roads are earning annually $7,520 per mile, a sum sufficient to pay the interest on a bonded indebtedness, at 5 per cent. per annum, of $150,400 per mile.

Now, the utmost bonded debt the companies could incur under the provisions of this bill would be $40,000 per mile on the main line, $35,000 per mile on the San Diego extension, and $30,000 per mile on the Vinita and other eastern connections. This is the outside limit, and the Government would only be liable, on account of interest, from $1,500 to $2,000 per mile, and not to this extent if the cost of construction falls below the limit allowed, which I believe will be the case.

I desire the attention of gentlemen to these striking figures and to the fact that this extraordinary showing of earnings upon the Union Pacific and California Central is upon a line of road traversing a wide extent of country of inferior natural resources, many hundred miles of which are devoid of population, except in isolated spots, and upon which vast sums of money have to be expended during the winter months to keep it open for travel, and, further, that this earning is at a period when transcontinental commerce is in its infancy and at a time of great commercial depression.

Such being the fact, may I not ask, if this line, with all its disadvantages of costly operation and frequent interruption to travel, its sparse population and unproductive soil, earns a sum sufficient to pay an interest of 5 per cent. on a debt of $150,400 per mile, can there be a doubt, when the southern line provided for in this bill shall be in operation from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, that its earnings will be as large? Certainly, no one acquainted with the comparative merits of the regions of country penetrated by the two lines can doubt it.

And when it is considered that nearly 70 per cent. of the earnings of the Union and Central Pacific lines is derived from local traffic, the view presented is more than confirmed.

It is in no invidious spirit that a comparison is instituted between the present and proposed line of Pacific roads, to the disadvantage of the former, for, whatever may have been the recklessness of congressional liberality in the grant of lands and money to it, there is hardly an enlightened man in the land who would be willing that the Government should take back its gifts and by some Aladdin-like enchantment obliterate the magic line across the continent which has annihilated space, established civilization in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and brought the dwellers on two oceans into close neighborship.

But I merely desire to show that, as the proposed southern line traverses a country of superior advantages, it would be able to meet its obligations to the Government; be a boon to the commercial world, and of advantage to the whole country. The one stretches across the continent on the high parallels of forty and forty-one degrees north latitude; over elevations varying from six to eight thousand feet above the sea level; subject to frequent and dangerous interruptions; traversing a thousand miles or more of desolate and unproductive country, much of it as dead to cultivation or the support of animal life as the Desert of Sahara.

In striking contrast to this is the line on the thirty-second and thirty-third parallels, the highest elevations of which are less than five thousand feet above tide-water; passing from the Mississippi River westward through ten degrees of longitude of as productive soil as the continent can boast; thence across the finest natural pastures to the valley of the Rio Grande, famous for its wheat, grapes, and fruit; thence along the rich valleys and grassy plains of Arizona and Southern California, with its western terminus upon the Bay of San Diego, rivaling in beauty the celebrated Bay of Naples and in a climate as genial as that of Southern Italy.

Besides the difference in climate, productiveness of soil, and capacity for rearing live stock along the southern line, it should be mentioned that the inexhaustible pine forests of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Eastern Texas would afford a local traffic to supply Western Texas and New Mexico with lumber that would be a constant source of revenue to the road, and in this connection, as another source of great local traffic, it should be remarked that the main line passes through extensive fields of excellent coal.

Another great source of traffic and prosperity to this line of road would be its proximity, for several hundred miles, to the northern states of Mexico.

There is no country known to civilization so prolific in the precious metals, especially silver, as these states. According to recent authorities the annual average coinage of the precious metals in Mexico cannot be less than $26,000,000 in silver and $3,000,000 in gold. Of this large amount a very great proportion is produced from the mines near to the proposed line of road.

The construction of the road would be the means of introducing machinery and skilled labor into these mines that would stimulate their production to an extraordinary degree.

It is a noteworthy fact that while the United States and Mexico, sister republics, have more than two thousand miles of contiguous territory, we enjoy but 15 per cent. of her foreign trade.

With the construction of the proposed railroad and the results that would naturally flow from it in the construction of a line from El Paso to the cities of Chihuahua, Durango, Queretaro, and to the city of Mexico; and from Tucson, in Arizona, to Guaymas, on the California Gulf, the condition of things would change, and instead of Mexico being an exporter to European markets of her precious metals and a consumer of the goods obtained in exchange, American labor would supply the fabrics, machinery, and goods required for Mexican consumption, and a new source of wealth would reward American enterprise.

But as rich in mineral deposits as are the northern states of Mexico, our own Territories of New Mexico and Arizona fall but little behind them.

Sufficient is known to warrant the assertion that when machinery can be carried there, and life is safe from Indian outrages, the mines of these Territories will prove to be as rich as the mines of Nevada. At this very time rich ores of gold and silver in the natural state are being transported on mules to Yuma, and thence shipped down the Colorado to the Gulf of California, and thence by sea to San Francisco; while crude copper, in bars, is hauled in Mexican carts from the copper-mines in New Mexico, a distance of nearly five hundred miles, to meet railroad transportation.

So that, Mr. Speaker, recurring to the point as to the value of the property proposed to be mortgaged to the Government to secure it against loss, I think I have clearly shown that the lien upon the roads and equipments would be ample; and further, that the net earnings, exclusive of any other security, would be more than sufficient to meet the interest on the guaranteed bonds.

But, sir, it is not alone the first-mortgage lien upon the roads and all their property, including the proceeds of the sales of land and earnings, out of which the Government is to be made safe for the loan of its credit, not to exceed $2,000 per mile; but you have also the retention in the Treasury of all the earnings of these lines of road for transportation of troops and supplies, and for postal and telegraph service. To enable you to form some opinion as to the extent and value of this security, I refer you to the last report of the Quartermaster-General, which shows that there have been paid to existing Pacific railroads, for military transportation, $7,288,830.04, with claims unadjusted, $610,720.98; total, $7,839,550.13. The amount earned last year on this account was $585,468.13. In proof of the assertion that the earnings from this source would be greater on the proposed lines than is shown by the figures above quoted, I call your attention to the fact that until the recent outbreak of the northern Sioux, which necessitated the temporary withdrawal from the Southwest of a very large portion of this force, there have been maintained for the last five or six years, at forty different military posts, eleven regiments of infantry and cavalry, which would have received their supplies by the lines of road, proposed by the bill, had they been in operation.

From this source alone the earnings of the company could not have been less than $1,000,000 annually, besides effecting to the Government a saving of more than three times that sum by the greater cheapness of railroad over wagon transportation.

Just how much that would be is strikingly shown in the letter of the Quartermaster-General to the Secretary of War, dated January 31, 1873, in which he says:

At the average rate, the estimated cost of transportation of the freight moved by the Union Pacific Railroad, including express charges, as shown above, during the time commencing July, 1866, and ending January 28, 1873, would be as follows:

Rates per 100 pounds per 100 miles, railroad rates, 40½ cents.
Rates per 100 pounds per hundred miles, wagon rates, $1.46.

Equivalent to about 66 per cent. saving.

In addition to this the Indian transportation must not be forgotten, and to show how enormous that is and what a saving to the Government it would be if we had rail transportation, I need only refer you to recent appropriations made for this branch of the public service.

For postal service on the Union and Central Pacific for the fiscal year ending the 30th June last, the earnings of these roads amount to $610,899.22. The increase in postal matter on these lines is at the annual rate of 13 per cent.; and at no very distant day, as the country continues to settle and develop and our commerce with Mexico and other countries increases, this source of revenue to the proposed line and consequent security to the Government would appreciate in value.

So that from these military, postal, telegraphic, and Indian necessities, we may safely venture the assertion the Government would hold in its own hands a security of not less than one million and a half annually to be applied to liquidation of interest.

Besides the security of the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the companies, amounting to about twenty-five million acres, which after completion of the roads must be very considerable, there are the $5,000 per mile of bonds, retained in the Treasury, which can be sold at any time to make good any deficit in sinking fund and interest. If there were no other security this would be sufficient. Such a bond, with a first mortgage on property so valuable, with the interest guaranteed by the Government, would sell for very nearly par, and no one will deny that it would bring more than twice the amount for which the Government would be bound.

Then, sir, may I not ask the most incredulous if the road itself, its earnings, the proceeds of the sales of bonds, the Government transportation and postal-service, and the $5,000 guaranteed bonds per mile, altogether, do not present a security that will be absolutely certain to hold the Government harmless against its obligations to meet an interest not to exceed, at the utmost limit, $2,000 per mile on eleven hundred and eighty-seven miles, $1,750 per mile on one hundred miles, and $1,500 per mile on ten hundred and eighteen miles? No candid and unprejudiced mind can doubt it.

Mr. Speaker, having established the necessity of this work and, as I think, demonstrated by the foregoing facts and figures that the Government could sustain no loss, the security being largely in excess of any possible liability, my next inquiry will be, Is the measure just?

For Congress to be just, in the sense of this inquiry, is for it to so shape its legislation that all sections of the Union shall enjoy equal benefits from the distribution of its favors. Has this been the case?

From the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it appears that the southern States have received the following donations of land for the purposes of internal improvement:

	Acres.
Alabama	3,579,120
Florida	2,360,114
Louisiana	1,577,840
Arkansas	4,879,149
Missouri	2,895,160
Total to southern States	15,381,383

The donations to northern States have been as follows:

	Acres.
Wisconsin	5,236,797
Minnesota	9,664,042
Oregon	1,888,600
Illinois	3,249,968
Iowa	6,795,256
Michigan	5,962,480
Kansas	8,840,000
Ohio	1,100,361
Indiana	1,439,279
Total to northern States	44,376,783

Grants of land to southern corporations, including the grant to the Texas and Pacific and the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburgh roads, 21,800,000 acres; to northern corporations, 95,036,760 acres; total to southern States and southern corporations for purposes of internal improvement, 37,181,383 acres; total to northern States and northern corporations, 149,413,543 acres. Is this a just distribution of the public domain?

Again, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the Senate January 7, 1874, it is shown that from 1789 to 1873 the appropriations of money in aid of the construction of wagon-roads, railroads, and canals were as follows:

For the sixteen southern and border States	$6,981,982 90
For the northern States and Territories	97,025,762 70

During the same period the Secretary's report shows that for other public works the disproportion was nearly as great, being $11,612,086.56 for the border and southern States, against $76,859,609.50 for the northern States and Territories.

If this is just, it is the justice of the partial father who leaves his millions to his favored son and cuts off another, who has equal claims to his love and protection, with a paltry shilling.

The instances of this partiality are so numerous that I forbear to weary you by their enumeration.

But, as a subject pertinent to this discussion, I cannot resist calling your attention to the extraordinary liberality of Congress in voting the lands and money of the Government for the construction of Pacific Railroads for the exclusive benefit of the northern sections of the Union. What I said before I repeat, that I allude to this branch of my subject with no unfriendly sentiments toward the favored corporations, much less toward my fellow-citizens inhabiting those sections of the country so greatly benefited by the liberality of the Government, but merely to ask that at least some liberality may be shown toward another important section of the Union.

From the official records in the General Land Office it appears that Congress has from time to time made the following grants of land to the Union and Pacific roads and their branches:

	Acres.
Union Pacific	12,000,000
Central Branch	245,000
The Denver Pacific	1,100,000
Burlington and Missouri River	3,680,968
Sioux City Pacific	60,000
Kansas Pacific	6,000,000
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific	1,261,181
Total to the Union Pacific and branches	27,922,147

The donations of land to the Central Pacific of California and its branches have been quite as liberal, as follows:

	Acres.
To the Central Pacific	8,000,000
To the Western Pacific	1,100,000
Oregon Branch	3,000,000
Oregon and California Railroad	3,500,000
Southern Pacific Branch of Central Pacific	9,520,000
Oregon Central	1,200,000
Total to Central Pacific and branches	25,120,000

making an aggregate donation to the two roads and their branches of 53,042,429 acres of the public domain.

If these donations of land seem munificent, the liberality of Congress toward those favored corporations in gifts of money will certainly not seem less so. The Government has issued bonds to the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies and their branches, and paid interest, not yet repaid by the companies, as follows:

To the Union Pacific:
Bonds	$27,236,512 00
Interest	9,391,684 65
Central branch of Union Pacific:
Bonds	1,600,000 00
Interest	883,400 21
Sioux City and Pacific, a branch of the Union Pacific:
Bonds	1,628,320 00
Interest	740,932 81
Kansas Pacific, a branch of the Union Pacific:
Bonds	6,303,000 00
Interest	1,980,475 05
Total for Union Pacific and branches	$48,761,234 51
To the Central Pacific:
Bonds	25,885,120 00
Interest	11,312,172 75
Western Pacific, branch of the Central Pacific:
Bonds	970,560 00
Interest	831,247 74
Total for Central Pacific and branches	$39,999,000 49

making a grand total for the main line and four branches of $91,052,795, or at the average rate of $32,782 per mile of indebtedness to the Government for the principal and unpaid interest of the bonds given in aid of the construction of twenty-seven hundred and eighty-nine miles of main line and branches.

This does not include the sum of $6,990,306.21 reported by the Secretary of the Interior as having been placed to the credit of the respective companies in payment for military and postal transportation and telegraph service.

There is one feature of these donations of land and bonds to the companies named to which I desire to ask the particular attention of gentlemen who may be disposed to criticise the recommendation of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad in reference to a guarantee of interest in aid of the construction of branches to the proposed trunk line. The committee had abundant precedent for such a course in past legislation. Of the 53,042,149 acres of public lands donated to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads and their branches only 20,000,000 accrued to the main-line roads, while 33,042,149 acres were bestowed upon their branches; and of this present money indebtedness to the Government, $27,227,305.60, or at the average rate of $28,179 per mile, are due from the branches.

In this connection it should be borne in mind that the Vinita branch, in consideration of the guarantee asked, is required to relinquish its unforfeited land grant, estimated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office at 41,496,165 acres; and, more than this: the Government is to be relieved from its obligation to extinguish the Indian title to lands for the company in the Indian Territory. And further, it should be remembered that the Vinita branch, the Memphis branch, and the San Diego connection, having a total length of six hundred and eighty-five miles, receive no grants of land whatever. If it was proper to give bonds to four of the branches of the existing line and lands to twelve of them, surely it is but just to guarantee the interest on these branches that get no lands at all; and can our friends who have been so largely benefited refuse it to us?

So, it will be seen that the scheme of the present bill, with only a main through line to San Diego, without any western branches, and with one eastern connection, that is to benefit the Middle and Northern States, and the three connections to Memphis, Vicksburgh, and New Orleans, falls in extent of miles of road immeasurably below that of the Union Pacific, with its radiating extensions, the Central Branch, Sioux City and Pacific, and the Kansas Pacific, upon which bonds of the Government were issued, and the Denver Pacific, Burlington and Missouri River, and Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, receiving grants of lands, thus making the main line of the Union Pacific and three branches that received Government bonds and the same roads and three additional branches receiving lands. Thus we see the six eastern connections of the Union Pacific spreading out from the main trunk east, to the Mississippi River, to Chicago, and to the States north and south, affording connections in every direction.

Look at the map. Here you see how every interest of the great West, of the East, and of the North has been cared for by the liberality of the Government. But look still further at the map; trace the main line of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific through the States and Territories to the Pacific Ocean, and then look at the branches on the western end. Here you see the Western Pacific, running from Sacramento to Oakland; the Oregon branch of the Central Pacific, running from near Sacramento, connecting with the Oregon and California Railroad running to Portland, and there connecting with the Oregon Central, extending to Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia River. Here you see the Southern Pacific, a connection of the Central Pacific, running from Lathrop through all that portion of California south of the main line, to Fort Yuma; besides another extension to Hollister and Santa Barbara, and continuing down the coast, making six branches or extensions on the western end and ramifying the country in every direction.

Compare the measure proposed by the committee, with its four eastern connections, with the Union and Central Pacific, with their six eastern and six western grand extensions, connecting the main lines with the Mississippi, the great lakes, and the Pacific, and with the vast net-work of railroads in the East and in the North and West, and you will see how moderate and how just is this demand, this plea in behalf of the South; sir, not only in behalf of the South, but equally in behalf of the commerce and interest of the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, may I not remind the members of this body that it was a southern State which gave to the Union the territory which now forms the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, and which has so largely enabled the General Government to foster and encourage the grand system of internal improvements to which I have referred? May I not further remind them that it was the common treasure of all the older States that made the Louisiana purchase; that it was the common blood and common treasure that secured New Mexico, California, and Arizona? Sir, may I not also remind them of the fact that southern tax-payers, southern toilers, and southern commerce contribute, alike with those of the North and East and West, to the common treasure which is bearing the burden of principal and interest of the bonds issued for the construction of the already completed Pacific roads and branches?

Mr. Speaker, in view of all the facts presented may we not most confidently appeal to our brethren of the more favored sections of the Union for help on this occasion.

Our friends from New England, whose harbors and fisheries and manufactories have so long received the bounty and care of the Government, should not begrudge us the little asked by this measure.

The Representatives from the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, with the commercial metropolis of each State made so largely from southern wealth and production, and which have received so much from the Government, should come forward with alacrity and aid us in this our day of poverty and suffering.

The five grand States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, that have received so liberally of the public lands, and whose boundaries are washed by the waters of the Ohio, the lakes, and the Mississippi, the annual recipients of the bounty of the Government for the promotion and protection of their commerce, will not surely turn a deaf ear to our appeals for help and justice.

Sir, may we not make an appeal equally as confident to the giant young States of Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, Oregon, California, and Nevada, States that have been so peculiarly and bountifully blessed with Government aid in lands and money for their works of internal improvement?

Let me remind these several interests that we have enacted a law which provides for the appropriation of millions to deepen the mouths of the Mississippi. This is done in the interest of the commerce of the whole country, but especially that northern and western production may have free egress to the waters of the ocean, and that their consumption of foreign commodities may be cheapened.

And now, sir, I would not close my appeal to the different sections and interests of the country without invoking the help of those from the South who have hitherto opposed this measure.

How long, how long will you continue to talk about constitutional power, when the power has been exercised almost every year since the foundation of the Government? Is not this a post-road? Is it not a military necessity? Does it not regulate commerce between the States?

Madison, Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, Calhoun, Clay, Webster, Benton, Douglass, Hunter, Jefferson Davis, Houston, and Rusk, recognized the power of Congress to do this thing.

Then, why should we falter and doubt? How long, my southern friends, will you refuse to aid yourselves, or to assist your kindred and your neighbors, because of your ancient prejudices against the policy of the Federal Government contributing its powerful countenance to the support of measures not purely governmental, but which do go a great way in providing for the common defense and general welfare?

Under your theory and practice, Arkansas and Missouri and other southern States have languished in poverty or fallen far behind some of their sisters in the march of progress. Their vast areas of productive soil; their water-power and ever-flowing streams; their deposits of iron and coal; their forests of walnut, ash, cypress, oak, and pine are almost useless to-day; their population and progress have not kept pace with other States less favored in climate, soil, productions, and mineral deposits. While the statesmen of the North, acting upon the acknowledged powers of Government, as sanctioned by Calhoun and others, have wisely looked to their own interests locally; and by so doing have added to the wealth and population of their localities, and have given to their sections an influence in the control of this Government, which, by our do-nothing policy, leaves our section, though older, with a more genial and favored climate, with a richer and more productive soil, far behind.

One of the main pillars of democracy, Mr. Douglas, was the author, I believe, of the land-grant system. Under his auspices, Illinois obtained from the General Government certain public lands, which that State granted to the Illinois Central Railroad Company.

Mr. Speaker, when I look back to this action of Congress and of the State of Illinois; when I look at the surroundings of that great State, and see her navigable waters of the lake, the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois River, and her canal, and regard her entire territory, a long, narrow State, in no place very distant from navigation, without half the productive capacity possessed by my State, and remember the public debt and taxation that weighed her down at that time, and contrast it with her present population, taxable values, and prosperity, I am filled with admiration at the sagacity and wisdom of her great statesman, Mr. Douglas. What was she in 1850, borne down and crushed with debt and taxation, incurred by a foolish effort to build up a system of internal improvements by State aid?

She incurred a debt of $20,000,000 and had secured scarcely a mile of completed railroad; but Mr. Douglas invoked the aid of Congress and got a grant of lands of six sections per mile, some of which had been in the market for years, and, under the graduating law, could have been entered at thirty-seven and one-half cents per acre.

Yet with this grant a railroad was speedily constructed from Cairo to Chicago, and a branch to Dubuque, on the Upper Mississippi, making connections with points that already had connections by navigable waters. In 1850 the population of Illinois was 846,000, now it is a little less than three millions. At that time Illinois owed $20,000,000, and her people groaned under a most ruinous load of taxation. Then her taxable property and values were $156,265,000. Then she had scarcely a mile of completed railroad. Now, mark the extraordinary change: In 1870 her taxable values were $2,121,680,000; her debt has been discharged by the 7 per cent. tax paid by the Illinois Central Railroad, and her State government is largely supported from the same source; and besides her navigable waters, she has six thousand four hundred and ninety-six miles of railroad. Who can wonder at her prosperity? Who should wonder that, though younger than any of the original thirteen States; younger than Kentucky and Tennessee, she should be the fourth State in population and influence in the Government. Her climate, her production, her area, her mineral wealth, are not superior, indeed they are inferior, to those of Missouri, and yet she is far ahead in population, wealth, and political influence.

I ask my southern friends to draw a useful lesson from these facts. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon them. Southern statesmanship should heed it.

While southern members of Congress have been stickling about State rights and the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution, northern statesmanship has asked and obtained favors from the Government that have conquered the inhospitality of climate; turned the wilderness of the great Northwest into populous States; built up commercial centers of trade; populated the desolate valleys, plains, and mountain-tops of our distant Territories, and made the sterile regions of Utah and Nevada contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the nation.

While these things have been going on the politicians of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, the Carolinas, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, Texas, and Missouri have been talking about State rights, about the powers conferred by the Constitution, and the true policy to be pursued by the Government.

The report of the chairman of the committee on this bill shows that both the political parties were pledged to this measure of a Pacific railroad in 1860. The necessity is as great now as then; necessity forced a line where it was then hardly anticipated.

Can either party or any person say that the present constructed line is not a monopoly which Congress seems powerless to control, or that the proposed measure will not take off a great burden both from the Government and the public, and make that competition which will lead to reasonable charges for fares and freights, and leave commerce unfettered to seek the safest and cheapest passage across the continent?

Not only are the two great political parties pledged to such work, but the people from every section of the Union have spoken out in favor of congressional aid to a southern line. The States of Texas, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Georgia, through their Legislatures, have passed resolutions approving the measure. The National Grange, which met at Charleston two years ago, declared in favor of it. The convention which met at Saint Louis last year, with delegates from almost every State and Territory, eight hundred in number, gentlemen of high character and ability, memorialized your body on this subject and recommended the branches provided for in this bill.

Then, sir, it is evident that the people and every interest of the country, except rival corporations and cities that desire a monopoly of transcontinental commerce, are in favor of Congress doing something to promote the speedy completion of this work.

And now, sir, I appeal to every fair and just minded member of this body, regardless of section, to come forward and sustain a measure that can have no ill-effect upon any section or any interest of the country, but which cannot fail to lighten the burdens of Government and of commerce; that will give renewed life and vigor to the industries of a large section of country; that will, in some degree, restore the equality of Government support to a portion of the States and Territories that have heretofore received very little of its bounty or care; a measure that none can deny will be most potent in giving lasting peace and quiet to an extensive border that has suffered untold miseries for want of adequate protection; that will prove an economy in the operations of the Army, in the transportation of supplies to troops and to Indians; in the postal and telegraphic service of the Government, that can be attained in no other way; that will open up new fields of industry and production and create new demands for the products of industries already in existence, that, without it, will never occur; that will open new fields for the acquirement of cheap homes for the many thousands of the homeless in the land who desire them; that will create a demand for and afford labor to the thousands of hungry and suffering toilers who to-day seek but cannot get employment; that would secure from a neighboring republic a largely increased commerce, bringing to us their exports and taking in return our productions, whose trade is now almost entirely enjoyed by other countries; a measure, sir, which, if carried into effect, will restore activity to a thousand furnaces whose fires are now going out, and bring back the cheerful, busy hum of industry in a thousand shops now idle; a measure, sir, that proposes not to curtail the labor or industry of the country, but would largely increase the demand for the one and greatly stimulate the other; a measure that would not diminish the circulation of coin or Government paper, that would not inflate the currency, but which would bring from abroad millions upon millions of foreign capital to add to our circulation of money, and which, during the fifty years the bonds have to run, will be paid, not by the mass of our people or by the Government, but by foreign commerce and by that portion of our people who may use the road for travel or traffic; a measure, sir, that will, in my judgment, do more to restore the ancient feeling of good-will and esteem between the people of the different sections of the Union and more effectually wipe out the bitter remembrances of the late civil war than any to which we can address ourselves, and which, if consummated, will bind all the interests and sections of this great Republic so closely and firmly together that we will forever remain one people, one Union, one Republic, linked and bound together by ties so strong, so interwoven with every interior interest, and so expansive as to clasp the remotest and most distant sections of the country—creating a unity of interest and reliance of one section upon another, so strong and so enduring, that all the powers of earth could not prevail against us.

Arrearages of Pensions.

SPEECH OF HON. A. V. RICE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1877,

On the bill to provide that all pensions on account of death, wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States since March 4, 1861, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, on application filed previous to January 1, 1880, shall commence from the date of death or discharge, and for the payment of the arrears of pensions.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, the careful consideration of this bill should attract the serious attention of the House. That its provisions are eminently proper and just, I think a full and thorough investigation will clearly show; and that the relief asked for in behalf of the maimed and diseased soldiers and sailors of the war of 1861, or the representatives of those killed in the defense of their country or who have since died from the effects of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in the military service of the United States, has not sooner been the subject of legislation by Congress is for the reason, I must think, that the matter has not before been brought to its consideration. No words of mine can appeal so strongly to the justice and propriety of this measure as does the condition of those for whom this relief is asked, scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, some of whom are known to every member of this House.

The object of the bill is to provide that the time for filing with the Commissioner of Pensions applications for pensions growing out of the war of 1861 shall be extended to the 1st day of January, 1880, and that the arrears of all such pensions, adjudicated or to be adjudicated, shall be paid from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension.

The law as it now stands, found in section 4709 of the Revised Statutes, limits the time of filing the application for such pensions with the Commissioner of Pensions to five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pensions shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

From a careful consideration of the subject, I think the present law is defective, and works palpable injustice to thousands of the brave defenders of the flag, and their wives and children, by depriving them of pensions and arrears justly due them. If a soldier or his representative is entitled to a pension at all, it is clear to my mind that it should be granted from the date of death or the time of discharge from service, provided the discharge is on account of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in the service and in line of duty, or from the date of the development of the disease by which he is incapacitated for labor, provided the disease is traceable and due to the military service of the United States. This is eminently proper and right, it seems to me, and great injustice has been done and is being done to all who, from whatever reason, patriotic or otherwise, did not apply for pensions within the time required by existing law.

From the earliest history of our country it has been the settled policy of the Government to pension its soldiers or their representatives, who shall have become disabled in the service from wounds or disease; and this too from the date of death or discharge from the service. And so fixed by law and usage has been this policy that the soldier on entering the service regarded it as part of his contract with the Government that in case of his death or disability his representative or himself should be granted a pension. And this is especially true in all the great wars we have had in which volunteers were called for in addition to the Regular Army, from the revolutionary war down to the war of 1861. Acting under this policy, unlike the great powers of the Old World, our Government has been relieved from the great burden and expense of maintaining large standing armies in time of peace; knowing and feeling that in any case of emergency a call for troops for the defense of the flag would be promptly responded to. The vindication of the wisdom of this policy has been fully and thoroughly attested in every hour of need in the history of our country, and at no time more fully than in the late war, in behalf of whose wounded and disabled soldiers we are now seeking relief. And to-day, under this fixed policy of the country, if unhappiiy our Government should become involved in a war with any foreign power and a call by the President for troops to defend the nation's honor should be made, it would be at once responded to by the people from all sections of the Union; and the boys who wore the blue and the boys who wore the gray, fighting in a common cause for the whole country, would vie with each other with laudable strife as to who should be most loyal to the flag and do most to sustain our national honor and perpetuate constitutional law under our republican institutions.

And now, Mr. Speaker, to show conclusively that it has been the policy of the Government, from its inception down to the late war, to pension the soldiers who have been disabled in the service of their country, I propose to refer to some of the resolutions and acts of Congress from time to time during the history of our country. And first, as foreshadowing this policy, the Continental Congress, during the early part of the revolutionary war, on the 26th day of August, 1776, the next month after the declaration of independence, provided as follows:

Resolved, That every commissioned officer, non-commissioned officer, and private soldier who shall lose a limb in any engagement, or be disabled in the service of the United States of America, as to render him incapable afterward of getting a livelihood, shall receive, during his life, or the continuance of such disability, the one-half of his monthly pay from and after the time that his pay as an officer or soldier ceases.

By the report of the board of war, September 25, 1778, it was further provided, for the relief those who suffered before the above-named resolution took effect, as follows:

Resolved, That all provisions and regulations contained in the said resolve of August 26, 1776, shall extend to all persons who lost a limb or were otherwise disabled as aforesaid in the service of the United Colonies or States of America, before the said 26th of August, and since the commencement of hostilities on the 19th of April, 1775.

And on a report of the Secretary of War Congress, on the 23d day of April, 1872—

Resolved, That all such sick and wounded soldiers of the armies of the United States, who shall in future be reported by the Inspector-General, or the inspector of a separate department, and approved by the Commander-in-Chief or commanding officer of a separate department, as unfit for further duty, either in the field or garrison, and who apply for a discharge in preference to being placed or continued in the corps of invalids, shall be discharged, and be entitled to receive as a pension $5 per month in lieu of all pay and emoluments.

These resolutions lie at the foundation of the pension system of the United States; and it will be seen that in August, 1776, at this early period of the military operations of the work of independence, this just and grateful system commenced, and, lest injustice might afterwards be done to the soldiers earliest in the field, the resolution of September, 1778, makes the benefits of the resolutions of August, 1776, retroactive to April 19, 1775, the time when the first gun was fired at Lexington.

By the act of the First Congress of the United States, passed September 29, 1789, the payment of the pensions provided for in the above resolutions was assumed by the United States for one year; by the acts of July 16, 1790, and March 3, 1791, the payment was assumed for two additional years, and by the act of March 23, 1792, the pensions were confirmed for life, and their payment assumed by the United States.

These, Mr. Speaker, were invalid pensions, debts due the pensioners, and made so by the contract, the terms of the enlistment, which provided that in the event a certain disability should be incurred in the service a certain pension should be paid, and the disabled soldier was as much entitled to this pension after his discharge as he was to his monthly stipend during the service. So, at least, thought the Congress of 1792, which ten years after the close of the revolutionary war, ratified the resolutions of the Continental Congress granting pensions to the disabled soldiers of the war, confirmed the pensions for life, and had the payment of the same assumed in full by the United States. This was right and just. Should we not do as much for the disabled soldiers of the war of 1861?

Coming down in the history of our country to the war with Great Britain, in anticipation of that war Congress, carrying out the policy adopted early in the revolutionary war, passed an act January 11, 1812, part of which provides as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private shall be disabled by wounds, or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pension and under such regulations as are or may be directed by law:

In 1846, when, by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war existed between that government and the United States, Congress, in pursuance of this policy of pensioning disabled soldiers, on May 13, 1846, passed an act providing for the prosecution of that war, the first section of which authorized the President to employ militia, naval and military forces of the United States, and to call for and accept volunteers, not exceeding 50,000. It further provided as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of the provisions of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefit which may be conferred on persons wounded in the service of the United States.

Coming down to our late civil war, and dealing directly with the laws enacted for the benefit of those whom we now seek to relieve by the passage of the bill under consideration, we find that Congress, actuated by the same spirit, and in conformity to the policy inaugurated in the war of the Revolution, and adhered to in all subsequent wars, in an act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property, approved July 22, 1861, passed the following:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service, and the widow, if there be one, and, if not, the legal heirs of such as died or may be killed in service, in addition to all arrears of pay and allowances, shall receive the sum of $100.

It will be remembered that this act was passed very early in the war, before many had entered the service, and in ratification of the promise (that such as might be wounded or contract disease in the service should have a pension) made by President Lincoln in his proclamation issued April, 1861, calling for volunteers to suppress the rebellion. July 14, 1862, an act to provide for pensions to invalids of the war of the rebellion and their relatives was passed as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private of the Army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, or any officer, warrant or petty officer, musician, seaman, ordinary seaman, flotillaman, marine, clerk, landsman, pilot, or other person in the Navy or Marine Corps, has been, since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter be, disabled by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States, and in the line of duty, he shall, upon making due proof of the fact, according to such forms and regulations as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law, be placed upon the list of invalid pensions of the United States, &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at some length I have given some of the principal laws enacted from the commencement of our Government touching the subject in question, and they all breathe the same spirit and proclaim the same humane policy, that of pensioning the soldier who is disabled in the service of his country while in line of duty. But different statutes of limitations have been passed depriving the disabled soldiers of their rights. The one now in force limits the filing of the application, in order that arrears of pension may be received to five years from the time the right thereto has accrued. Shall this limitation stand upon the statute-books of the land, thereby working great injustice to thousands and making void this principle early adopted by the Government? Or shall we not rather by the passage of the bill under consideration fulfill the contract and carry out the spirit of the laws of 1861 and 1862? Should the fact that for some reason the disabled soldier failed for five years after the right thereto had accrued to apply for the pension the contract gives him bar him from its privileges? I say certainly not.

For various reasons he may have been deterred from making the application. In many instances these causes were unavoidable, and in the act fixing a limitation for the application no provisions were made to meet the numerous contingencies that subsequently arose, which entirely prohibited a compliance with its requirements, thereby depriving the applicant of the indemnity intended to be given. Among the causes of delay in filing applications for pensions within the time for obtaining arrears may be mentioned negligence, ignorance, and inattention of pension-claim agents in the preparation and prosecution of claims intrusted to their care; loss of papers and proofs by agents, and consequent delay in obtaining new evidence on which to base the claim before the limitation by law expired. Mistakes of agents in the preparation of cases and in many instances erroneous information from persons in whom the applicant placed reliance have caused delay. Frequent complaints are made that agents recognized by the Pension Department have absconded with proofs and papers of claimants in their hands; and in other instances agents claim to have forwarded applications and proofs to the Department which have never reached their destination but have been lost through the mails; while loss of proofs and papers in the hands of agents by fire is not unfrequent. From any of these causes of delay mentioned should the innocent applicant suffer and fail to receive the amount due him when, by no fault of his own, his application and proofs, though made within the prescribed time, were not received at the Department? No one would say so.

In many instances applicants for pension did not know the time of the limitations and in others they were ignorant as to the amount of disability required to obtain it. Great delay is frequently unavoidable in procuring certificates of disability from officers and comrades on account of death and removal to parts unknown; and especially is this true in getting the testimony most important in the case, that of the surgeon, while the destruction and imperfections of hospital records are so great that not unfrequently in most meritorious cases the procuring of this important and almost indispensable proof has been the cause of long-continued delay. When we take into consideration the facts that many organizations were made up of men from all parts of the country, who upon disbandment were scattered in every direction, the difficulty in obtaining the necessary proof required by law, and the consequent delay, can easily be comprehended. Again, many entitled to pensions did not make applications within the prescribed time from patriotic motives; some being so circumstanced that they did not need the relief, while others preferred to depend on their own efforts rather than seek aid from the Government; but reverses in fortune and continued and failing health, from wounds received or disease contracted in the service, induced them to apply for pensions, too late, however, to receive the arrears so justly due them.

Other causes of delay might be given, but it is not necessary. I would simply remark that frequently I have known most deserving cases, from a sense of delicacy and a hope of improvement in their condition, hesitate long before asking the aid due them from the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, if there were none of these numerous causes for legitimate and unavoidable delay, (which is true in a great majority of cases to whom arrears of pensions are due,) in view of the fixed policy of the Government, to which I have fully referred, and especially because of the acts of July, 1861, and July, 1862, together with the proclamation of President Lincoln pledging the faith of the country to the payment of these pensions in the event of the disability of the soldier, it is the bounden duty of the Government to pay such pensions, together with the arrears, notwithstanding the application may not have been made within five years from the time the right thereto accrued. By the laws referred to they are constituted a contract, and as such they become a debt, a debt the most sacred the Government could incur; and we ought to let nothing be done that would defeat the just expectations that persons entering the service under the law had a right to cherish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Government agrees with the soldier that if he goes into the service and shall become disabled by wounds or disease he or his representatives shall be provided for with a pension. This is a contract, an agreement for services to be rendered, and in the event of disability incurred while performing that service, then, in consideration of said disability, a further compensation is to be paid in the shape of a pension; a promise for a consideration made and accepted. Could a stronger or more binding contract be made in law? Can it be violated? Can the Government plead the statutes of limitations? I think not. Alex. H. H. Stuart, in October 29, 1850, then Secretary of the Interior, speaking of the acts of January 11, 1812, and February 11, 1847, in similar cases, says:

Inducements held out for the purpose of increasing the rank and file of the Army partake of the nature of the consideration of a contract.

Raff, in commenting on this, says:

In other words, that a promise contained in an act under which a soldier enlists that he shall be provided for in case of disability incurred in the service binds the Government, and cannot be receded from without consent of the soldier.

William Wirt, Attorney-General of the United States, June 9, 1825, in speaking of the claim of the widow of an officer for pension, says:

It is in the nature of an absolute engagement or promise made to those officers and men that if they fall in the service of their country so much shall be paid to their wives and children, without inquiry into the fact whether they stand in need of it or not. Nor is there any condition annexed to the promise that the money shall be paid if applied for in a given time, or in a given state of things. It is bottomed only on the single condition that the husband and father shall die in the service of his country; on the happening of which condition the public engagement becomes a debt, which is as much property, and the property of the widow and children, as any bonds which the deceased may have left to them by his will.

Now, by a parity of reasoning, which is entirely fair, the pensions to be granted by the contract and terms of enlistment to the wounded and disabled soldiers of the late war are in the nature of an absolute engagement or promise that if they are wounded or disabled in the service so much shall be paid to them or their representatives. Nor is there any condition annexed to the promise as to time of application for pension. It is bottomed only on the condition that they shall be wounded or disabled in the service of their country, on the happening of which condition the public engagement becomes a debt, which becomes the property of the disabled soldier as much as if the Government had issued its bond to him outright.

If the Government had promised or contracted with a foreign power to pay an indemnity in the event of the happening of a certain contingency, could we, dare we, repudiate the payment of the same, provided the contingency transpired? Surely not. No more can we refuse the payment of pensions for disability incurred in the service when the promise had been made and the faith of the Government pledged at or before the time of entering the service that in case of disability such payment should be made.

During the late war, in the time of its extremity, the Government was in sore distress for means with which to purchase supplies, buy munitions of war, pay the armies in the field, and prosecute the war to a successful termination. Large inducements were offered to the capitalists of the country to supply the "sinews of war." For the money thus furnished bonds to large amounts were issued by the Government. These bonds bore interest, most of which was payable in gold, but the principal was payable chiefly in the currency of the country—the same money with which the bonds were purchased, and the same money that paid the soldier in the field—legal tenders. Were the bonds thus issued repudiated? No, but on the 18th of March, 1869, an act was passed making them payable in gold. Many there are who believe that this act was a repudiation of the contract in favor of the holder of the bonds and to the detriment of the people who have them to pay, and who at that time were greatly burdened and oppressed by heavy taxation, caused by the mountain of debt into which our country was plunged by the events of the war. At least the holders of the bonds cannot now complain.

But not to comment on the justice or injustice of this act, its wisdom or unwisdom, can we by our act deprive the maimed and wounded soldiers of the war of the pensions promised them by the Government? And shall we hold in less esteem the men who by their bravery and valor, their courage and endurance, preserved the integrity of the Union inviolate than we do those who out of their abundance loaned the Government a part of their means in the time of its extreme need? The Government has fully provided for those who loaned it money to prosecute the war. As well should it in good faith fulfill its promises to those who fought its battles and were disabled in the performance of those duties. We cannot repudiate this sacred debt of blood and sacrifice, of sorrow and pain, nor plead the statutes of limitation upon the claimants.

But it has been claimed by distinguished and able gentlemen [Mr. KASSON of Iowa and Mr. HURLBUT of Illinois] on this floor, that all pensions were mere gratuities that might be granted or withheld at the pleasure of the Government, and the continuance of them were at the discretion of the Government. And when, during the last session, a bill concerning pensions was under consideration the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] said:

I desire, gentlemen, to consider here that there is not and cannot be any such thing as a vested right, a commercial transaction, between the country and those who are the recipients of its bounty. * * * So whoever may render service in a military capacity to the nation simply does his plain, unmistakable, undeniable duty, and whatever reward the nation may give him for having done that duty is in the line of free gift and grace, and not in the line of contract.

Notwithstanding the distinguished military service of the gentleman and his acknowledged legal ability, in the discussion of the subject he has failed to mark the distinctions that are recognized by law between the several forms of governmental bounty. In his decision of October 29, 1850, Alexander H. H. Stuart, then Secretary of the Interior, says:

Invalid pensions are grants of money to persons who become disabled in the service, either by wounds or other injuries received, or by sickness contracted in the line of duty, whereby the sufferer is rendered incapable, in whole or in part, of procuring for himself and those dependent upon him a livelihood. When promised, at or before entering the service, this class of pensions may be regarded as forming a part of the consideration upon which the contract of service is based, and not a gratuity merely.

Gratuitous pensions are not given for wounds received or disease contracted, but are usually granted at the close of a long term of service as a reward for extended and faithful duty; or they are granted many years after the close of an important war as evidence of a nation's gratitude to its defenders. Thus years after the revolutionary war the survivors were pensioned; and so in 1871 the Government pensioned the survivors of the war of 1812. The difference between the invalid and gratuitous pension is very marked and should be borne in mind.

The soldiers, for whom relief is asked in this bill, come under the first class, and their claim constitutes a debt—a debt of blood and pain, of privations and hardships, of wounds and tears, of sickness and disease. Should it not be paid? Justice, duty, and good faith require that it should.

The only argument, Mr. Speaker, against its payment is the amount of money the indemnity would take. This cannot be called an argument against the measure, but rather an admission that the relief asked for in the bill should be granted, and would be if the granting did not involve too much money. Can such grounds be maintained? Can the great Government of the United States, with its large wealth and boundless resources, hesitate one moment in liquidating this sacred obligation? Most of those who would be the recipients of this fund are now suffering and in needy and straitened circumstances. Some of them are poor and wasted, the victims of disease fastened on them in the service. Some are wounded and crippled, their lives a "living death," while others are poor, worn women with helpless children.

The following statement prepared in the Interior Department (Pension Office) will show the estimated number of cases in which limitation has applied to the close of 1875, and also the amount required for the payment of arrears should this bill become a law:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, PENSION OFFICE, March 8, 1876.

It will be seen that the estimated number of invalids, soldiers disabled from wounds or disease, to whom limitation applies from 1868 to 1875, inclusive, is 16,454, and to pay the arrearages due them would require an estimated amount of $9,529,775.16. Number of widows and dependent relatives from 1868 to 1875, inclusive, is 5,145, requiring for the payment of arrearages $3,887,334, or a total of 21,599 cases, requiring $13,417,109.16, estimated amount to make payment of arrearages. Taking it for granted that the estimated number of cases is correct, I am satisfied that the estimates for payment of arrearages are too high by from 25 to 50 per cent., or, say, an average of 33 per cent. The estimates are made on the supposition that the disabilities in all these cases is total and has been during the past eight years, or since the limitation began to operate, when the fact is the disability in some cases would be one-fourth, in others one-third, and so on, up to total. The average would be perhaps two-thirds, and for former years probably less, as it is well known that disabilities incurred in the service, either from wounds or disease, increase year by year rather than decrease. This is not always the case; however, the bill makes no change in rating the disability, which is still regulated by existing law. So it will be seen that the disability for the 21,599 cases estimated would not average over two-thirds. One-third should then be deducted from the amount required to pay the arrearages:

Estimated amount required by the bill	$13,417,109 16
Deduct one-third	4,472,369 72
Balance or probable amount necessary to pay arrearages	8,944,739 44

Which, I think, would be about the amount required, and probably not more than one-third of this would be needed the first year.

But whatever the amount required, it should be paid. This is a question of right. It is a measure that has no political or partisan signification, and ought not to have; but high above all such considerations, it commends itself to our patriotism, our sense of right and justice, our highest duty. And I appeal to all the members on this floor, the Representatives from all sections of the Union, the reunited States, made so by the courage and valor of these soldiers, for whose benefit and relief this bill is framed, to give this bill your cordial support. I appeal to the members on this side of the House, and especially to the Representatives from the Southern States who during the late civil strife struggled so earnestly for the "lost cause," but who now, thanks to these wounded soldiers of the North and their comrades in arms, are back in their "father's house," and to stay, and who are willing and anxious for peace and union, and to attest their loyalty and devotion to the "old flag" in every legitimate and honorable manner, to give this bill your hearty support. And I feel that I do not ask in vain. And to the gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber, and the gentlemen from this, who during those terribly dark and dreary days of the war did so much in the field, in legislative halls, and in this Capitol to support and sustain the Government of the United States, I appeal, and I feel that I shall not ask in vain.

Pass this just and humane measure of relief, and thousands of maimed and wounded soldiers all over this broad land, and their helpless and needy wives and children, will rise up and call you blessed.

The Presidential Count.

SPEECH OF HON. H. WATTERSON,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Oregon.

Mr. WATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall join in no movement to obstruct the progress of the presidential count. If the deed is to be done, and sure all of us know that it is to be done, "t' were better when 'tis done, 't were done quickly." No man has worked harder or longer than I have to prevent it. No man is more hurt by it than I am; but, as matters stand, it is inevitable. The power does not exist to place the man whom the people elected in the presidential office. The power does not exist to put an estoppel upon the inauguration of the man whom the people did not elect. The Army, led by the General-in-Chief, is here ready to escort him to the door of the White House; the Chief Magistrate stands at the door ready to receive him; the Chief-Justice, attended by a majority of the Supreme Court, is within ready to administer to him the oath of office according to the forms of law. There is not so much as a single unarmed Kentuckian to resist.

The House is able neither to resist nor obstruct. It can only refuse to proceed with the count. What then? Why, the Senate aided by the minority on this floor, will finish the job, declare the result and carry out the original programme of conspiracy with which the republican leaders began their post election campaign. You say this is lawless. You say it is usurpation. Well, suppose it is, what do they care? Are they worse off for the electoral commission than they were before? Are they not better off for our impotent and blind fury?

Let us see. I hold that futile resistance is always to be avoided, particularly when the act of resistance has no objective point. The time for successful action on our part was three months ago. We knew the desperate character of our enemy then as well as we know it now. Nay, his plans and schemes were all before us. Organization, preparation, was pressed upon us. Did we raise a hand? Why, the very suggestion was hooted. At length there came a moment when, unable to set a squadron in the field, we were offered an alternative—a very Hobson's choice indeed—the electoral bill or a backdown. I fought this bill for hours in the committee of advisement. I fought it until I was no longer able to answer the arguments and facts brought to bear on the question by Senator BAYARD and Senator THURMAN, and even more notably by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] a democrat whose manhood no less than his ability has won the respect and regard of this House. Then, failing to establish my view, I did what I always do and always shall do under similar circumstances—being unable to further meet and contest the case in friendly debate with my colleagues, I accepted their view and joined them in the measure proposed. But I was by no means lured into a feeling of security. I perfectly understood that the bill was a choice of evils. In the remarks which I had the honor to submit to this House I said, "I accept this measure with the full consciousness that it may bitterly disappoint me and those who think and feel with me; if it does, I shall still have performed a most unpleasing duty in that manner which was best calculated to preserve the public peace at a time when the people were not prepared for war."

The result has vindicated my discernment most sadly. I deplore it, but I see no means of escaping it. Many members of this House whose judgment has obtained the public confidence are of the same opinion. Those who affect to think differently propose nothing definite. They have no objective point, except chaos or a case in law.

God help us! we have enough of "law"—such "law" as the Supreme Court has to give us.

We have also had enough anarchy.

There was never but one chance to seat Mr. Tilden in the office to which he was elected by the people. That was for him, and for those immediately about him, to announce his election as soon as he was elected, to proclaim the conspiracy that was already organized to defeat his inauguration, to bring the people to some concert of action among themselves, and to give proof to the country and the world that they meant what they said, and were not to be browbeaten or thwarted. Nothing of the kind was done, though it was proposed. Congress met in a fog of uncertainty. We had a deal of talk and much beating about the bush; and finally our great cause, the people's cause, degenerated into a nisi prius case before a packed jury. The result is before us; and as I said before, we cannot escape it. Our sole power now is to make the best we can of a very hard bargain, to close ranks, to preserve our morale, to accept the contingency provided for by our own act, to appeal from the electoral commission to the ballot-box, to pick our flint and try it again, or to sulk, "put finger i' the eye," divide, and go to pieces. Which is the better course? For my part, I have no mind for leaping from the frying-pan into the fire. I urged a resolute policy when there was the occasion to give it efficacy. The time has passed when bold movements could avail us. To-day, we have little impulse but our anger left, and no supports at all. If we are wise, we shall take into account all the circumstances that surround us, we shall resume possession of ourselves, we shall give our enemy the full rope and line of his wrong-doing. Does any man think there is no penalty fixed to political excess? If he does he is mistaken. In public, as in private life, the infraction of God's laws and the people's interests meets its due condemnation and punishment soon or late. The republican party is a great sinner, and has withstood its destiny a long time I do admit. But the last four years have witnessed the taking off of many of its guiltiest leaders. Year by year they will continue to come to grief. In its order the party itself will fall, crushing these that remain with it in its complete and final wreck. I take this "on faith," and my faith is strong and pure, faith in the great creative principle of the universe, faith in free institutions, faith in the people, and faith in the future. I have no faith in the violent method proposed by some of our friends who are grown warlike after the event. They remind me only of Swift's Irish Engineers:

> "When all is lost that's worth defense
> They build a magazine."

In this present battle all is lost except our honor, the memory of our struggle, the glory of our triumph, the lesson of our surrender.

It chokes me to think about it. I will not think about it. I will turn away from it. I will not so much as drop a word of passing scorn on those who have soiled the ermine; for, God forgive me and forgive us all, the chance, if not the fault, was not wholly theirs. If we are to live for some wise and good purpose—the democratic party of the nation, I mean, that has lived through so many tempests, hulk or iron-clad, well-manned or ill-manned, the survivor of so many disasters—we have something better to live for than epithets, at best a poor and barren child's play. If Mr. Hayes is to come into the Presidency, as coming in he is, I would not contest his legal title to the office. I would make no idle, factious outcry. I would not block his way. But I would let him pass along, saying merely, "Sir, it is your turn to-day; to-morrow it may be another's; let those laugh most who laugh last."

No man need fear a break in the democratic line. The South is particularly unripe for plucking; neither is it for sale. During ten years it has piled up proof of its capacity for endurance. All this session it has given hostages to fortune and—the North. To-day it is standing by its count, a true exponent of fidelity and peace. If Mr. Hayes sees fit to vary the policy of national proscription and military interference which has characterized the administration of General Grant he will do a wise thing for himself, a just thing for the South, and a good thing for the whole country. But the South proposes to ask nothing, to buy nothing of him or those who shall rule with him. The manner of his coming in builds a wall between his administration and those embracing a great majority of his fellow-citizens, who preferred another. There can be no compromise with the republican party; no compromise with the historic eight. As Mr. Hayes may do the right, he will receive the commendation of good men; but this is not expected of him, nor will it inure to the benefit of his party or wipe out the disgrace of his coming in. I fear then if he be the liberal and conservative man he is said to be he, will not long remain so. He belongs to a party whose nature is changeless, and it will the rather control him than he it. The democratic party has but to pick itself out of the slough of dsspond, look calmly at the situation as it is, and move forward bravely up the rocky ridge. There may be a deserter here and there. If there is, let him go. There may be, there will be, many a comrade who shall never mount the hill. Bury him with the honors of war and march forward. For us the word should be, as it was given by the greatest of philosophers and statesmen a hundred years ago, "Cheer us if we run; console us if we fall; but, for God's sake, let us pass on; let us pass on."

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have made my meaning full and plain. I would assail no man's motives. Knowing the integrity of my own, conceiving the full force and significance of the calamity which has come upon the country, I refuse to be crushed by it. I have no regrets or excuses to make for any act of mine. A greater Architect than I gave shape to the materials with which I have had to deal in my poor way. Would it had been stronger, wiser; but such as it was it is, and I stand by the record. I shall go hence to another and fairer scene; and, seeing the spring flowers illuminate the blue grass of Kentucky, signals at once of God's love and bounty, shall feel that the heavens are not yet robbed of their sunshine, the earth of its fruition, nor the future of hope.

The Decision of the Eelctoral Commission.

SPEECH OF HON. CASEY YOUNG,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, within this Chamber at this hour of midnight the curtain is about to fall upon the most remarkable and in many particulars the saddest drama ever enacted upon the political stage of any nation on earth.

The grandest moral and political victory the American people ever achieved has just been won, and under its shadow the greatest crime ever perpetrated against them is about to be consummated. A great victory was won when on the passage of the electoral bill patriotism and love of country triumphed over party passion and party allegiance, and law and order prevailed against the spirit of violence and tumult.

A great crime is being committed when, by the judgment of the electoral commission, three great States of this Union are to be disrobed of their sovereignty, the people of every section deprived of their rights, and public confidence shaken, if not destroyed, in the honesty of public officials. The free institutions of our country and the public virtue of our people is about to receive a blow from which recovery will be difficult if not wholly impossible.

In what I shall say I do not propose to discuss in any of its features the question now directly before the House, and I should perhaps offer no observations at all did I not desire to refer to some things of which I deem it my duty to speak. The political views which myself and some other representatives from the South are supposed to entertain and our probable future political conduct have been the subject of a newspaper speculation and inquiry in which I have received some censure which I did not deserve and some commendation to which I am not entitled.

If what has been said in the public press in reference to myself was only a comment upon my own particular views and a conjecture as to my future individual political conduct, I should perhaps not deem it necessary or important to state in this public manner how far I have been correctly represented, or to declare what opinion I held, or what course I shall pursue. But as these speculations and conjectures with which my name has been connected refer to and embrace a whole distinctive class of our people, and, by implication at least, if not by direct assertion, does the grossest injustice to their patriotism, integrity, and good faith, all question of the propriety of the step is removed, and it becomes an imperative duty to speak in their behalf, though I should abide in silence public judgment upon my own actions.

To that class of citizens of which I speak I belong as well by the accident of birth as by subsequent choice and inclination. With them my fortunes have been cast, and to them I have been bound by sympathy in all of their misfortunes and sorrows during the long years that they have been the object of political proscription and sectional hostility.

To them I am linked by the ties of a common lineage and bonds of fraternal sympathy, by the memories of the past, and the destiny, whether good or evil, which awaits them in the future. Their fate shall be mine; the whisper of no siren's voice shall lure me from my duty and devotion to them; the gratification of no ambition, the pride of no success, and the honor of no position shall tempt me to betray or abandon them. No political evil can befall them which I would not willingly share, and I desire no political good which I cannot bestow upon them. A portion of them have confided to me the high trust of representing them in this body and guarding as best I may their political interest, honor, and integrity as a part of the great family of American citizens. I should be unworthy of their trust and confidence did I not avail myself of this opportunity, perhaps the last of the session, to place them as far as I can in a position to receive an impartial judgment from at least that class of their countrymen of other sections who are not mad with party passion and blinded by political prejudice and hostility.

I might remain silent and hear language of contumely and insult applied to myself and be nothing worse than a coward, but to make no defense when they are assailed, to utter no word of vindication when their patriotism is questioned, or their honor is aspersed, I should be an ingrate and a traitor. During the short time that I have occupied a seat upon this floor I have been too often made to feel that the presence here of myself and other southern representatives was distasteful to many gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, and we have been made painfully aware of the fact that we were unwelcome guests in this the house of our fathers.

How far this conduct toward us accords with the courtesy which we thought we had a right to expect from political opponents, or to what extent it is approved by the dictates of a wise and enlightened statesmanship, I will not pause to inquire. To some our former relations to the Government may furnish a sufficient excuse for a denunciation and criticism which under other circumstances no party exigency and no political necessity could warrant or justify.

I shall not now undertake to discuss any of the causes which through a long series of years led to the estrangement of the people of the South from those of the other sections of the Union, and which finally culminated in a civil strife, which for four years of blood and carnage ravaged and desolated the land. Nor shall I refer to the immediate and clearly foreseen results of that mighty struggle. All these have passed into history, and posterity will doubtless form a correct estimate of the motives and conduct of the actors in the fearful drama of our civil war. It is perhaps, however, not too much to hope and predict that when the hot passions and bitter enmities which it naturally engendered shall have passed away, and when the judgment of men shall be guided by reason and calm reflection, their conclusion will be that our internecine strife was the sequence of circumstances which no wisdom or statesmanship could have directed or controlled.

But, however this may be, the people of the South believed they were right when they entered upon the contest, and when it was over yielded reluctantly it may be, but in good faith, to a power which they could no longer resist, convinced by the stern logic of an unsuccessful war that the cause for which they had fought was lost forever. When the banner which they had followed so long and with such antique heroism and lofty courage was folded in defeat and they pledged their honor to abide faithfully the terms of their surrender, they did it with a fixed and honest purpose to observe it; and whatever may be ignorantly or willfully said to the contrary, I assert that from that hour to the present they have stood fast by their compact, with inviolate faith and untarnished honor, though while doing it they have been the victims of sorrows, persecutions, and oppressions through which no people have passed since the children of Israel were held in the bondage of Egypt.

There is scarcely a political crime which has not been perpetrated against them, hardly a social evil which has not been imposed upon them, and no legislative enactment calculated to outrage their feelings and humiliate their pride which partisan malice and ingenuity could devise which has not been incorporated in the laws of their States or fastened upon the statute-books of the nation without their will and consent. But amid all these grievances that sometimes stung them almost to madness and seemed to shut out every hope of the future, they have been loyal to the Federal Government, making no resistance to its authority and waiting patiently for the time when they would be restored to its favor and confidence, when they would once more be the equals of its other citizens. A few months ago they thought that time had come. Looking back over the desert waste of ten years of misrule and oppression, the charred and blackened monuments of social, political, and material ruin and desolation which rose all over their fair land receded in the background and commenced to fade from their vision, and looking forward with anxious, eager hope to the future they thought they beheld the coming of a dawn that would dispel the darkness of the long night which had enveloped them in its gloom.

On the 8th of November last, they knew that the democracy of the nation had won by the lawful and peaceful agency of the ballot-box the grandest victory ever achieved in political warfare. On the morning of that day the telegraph brought over the net-work of wires, which span our vast country, the glad news from every section of the Union, that more than a quarter of a million majority of American citizens had a few hours before cast their votes for the candidates of the democratic party for President and Vice-President of the United States. With no thought that the voice of the people would be disregarded, they looked forward to a lawful and peaceful consummation of the popular will. Their representatives came on to this capital, imbued with that conservative spirit of law and order which prevailed among the masses of their constituency at home, and without which no free representative government can exist, resolved to do all that their duty as citizens and their solemn obligations as members of the National Legislature required at their hands, to maintain the rights of the people and to save the country from the perils which threatened it. When they reached here they found the public peace and tranquillity, and even the safety of our form of government, menaced with the most fearful and alarming dangers.

Party passion was aroused; the clamor of partisan leaders rang through the halls of the Capitol; the minions of power were gathering around us, ready in the first moment of tumult or disorder to strike down with iron hand every attribute and safeguard of free government. Patriotic and thinking men of both parties saw dark clouds spreading over our political skies, charged with the elements of destruction, presaging a storm which bursting in its fury would pour upon us a deluge of evils which would finally ingulf us in lasting and irretrievable ruin.

To avert these perils a measure of peace and conciliation was suggested by the impulses of patriotism and love of country. A method by which the dangerous problem which confronted us might be solved in a lawful and constitutional manner, was devised by the ablest and most distinguished members of both Houses of Congress, from among both political parties, and it met with an indorsement seldom if ever before accorded to any measure of legislation, and by none was it indorsed with more cordial unanimity than by the southern members of this body. They knew that the democratic party had been triumphant in the recent presidential election, and that the candidates of that party were justly entitled to be inducted into the high offices to which they had been called by an unquestioned majority of the popular vote that they should of right wear the brilliant honors they had fairly won. They knew they had a legal and moral right by the Constitution and laws of their country, as well as by that code of equity and fair dealing by which all honest men are governed, to demand the inauguration of Tilden and Hendricks as President and Vice-President of the United States. But when they saw the dangers that threatened the entire country upon every hand, when they beheld the waves of party passion being lashed into fury by a coming tempest, they were willing, in order to save their country from ruin, to concede some of the rights to which they believed they were clearly entitled. They were willing to sacrifice the love of political power, the pride of party success and supremacy, nay, to surrender all save honor and principle to guard from shipwreck republican government, free institutions, and the happiness of the American people. They had seen somewhat more of the horrors of civil war and the disorder and ruin which followed it, than the people of other sections of the country, and were therefore better prepared to appreciate the wide-spread and irreparable ruin which another domestic commotion, another appeal to arms would entail upon the country, and the sorrow in which it would shroud every household in the land. Therefore it was that they so cheerfully and willingly gave their support to the bill creating the electoral commission, believing as they did that this afforded as fair a means as could, under the circumstances, be devised to determine justly and impartially the question in doubt between the two parties as affecting the presidential election, and which threatened a disturbance of the public peace.

The commission thus created was charged with the most awful and sacred duty ever confided to mortal man since the day when Jehovah, from amid the clouds of Mount Sinai, gave his law to Moses and bade him go forth and teach it to his people. When the voice of the American people, speaking through their representatives in Congress, commanded fifteen of their servants to lead them from the dark and dreary wilderness of political doubt and uncertainty which surrounded them, no thunder, it is true, shook the Capitol, and no cloud enveloped its Dome; yet no phenomena could have made their duties more solemn or the command they received more impressive. No question of such grandeur and magnitude was ever before submitted to human wisdom; no such sublime work as they were called upon to perform was ever before wrought by human hands. To their integrity, honesty, and patriotism was intrusted the immediate interest of more than forty millions of people, and along with that the guerdon of human freedom and republican government throughout the world in all time to come; for, sir, when this great Republic is overthrown no other will ever rise in its place; when the spirit of freedom and love of self-government shall no longer abide in the hearts of the American people, the influence of these great principles will never again shape the actions of mankind; but either the law of force, the rule of anarchy, or the right of kings will hold undisputed sway over the nations of earth. In the presence of this high tribunal, more august and imposing than a council of rulers or a court of kings, representing the judicial dignity and power, and holding in its grasp the destinies of a mighty nation, the angry babbling of the demagogue and the murmur of the discontented partisan were hushed into silence, and the whole people with trembling, breathless anxiety looked forward to the result of its labors.

Those labors are ended. The public, now that the anxiety and suspense which they excited have scarcely yet passed away, is sitting in hasty relentless judgment upon the conduct and motives of its authors; but the future effect of their work upon the public interest and the character of our country and the people is of far more importance, and will be more patiently and perhaps more fairly judged.

When I gave my support to the electoral bill I was actuated primarily by a desire to avert a danger which I felt and knew to be most imminent, and from which I saw no other escape; and secondly, by the hope and belief that it would insure the peaceful and quiet inauguration of the President lawfully chosen by the people, and satisfy the public mind that he was justly and fairly entitled to that high and responsible office. It is true that I thought the bill defective in its structure as to details, that it was too vague and indefinite in its terms, and admitted of too much latitude in the discretion of those who were to construe and apply it; but I had no power to change it in these respects, and I was willing to risk the ability and impartial judgment of those who should be chosen to expound and carry it into effect. I will not attempt to portray nor endeavor to conceal how sadly I am disappointed or how deeply I am grieved at the decision which the commission has rendered, but I shall not have the weakness of complaining in ill-natured and petulant language of a result which I have no power to change or reverse. There is but one tribunal of final resort to which an appeal can be had, and that is that sovereign power to which in this country we must all submit—the people, who have made us their agents for the conduct of this and all other public affairs. Their judgment, when untrammeled by party ties and unawed by lawless power, will not fail of that impartial expression which cannot perhaps be expected in this hour of exultation upon the one side and gloom and depression upon the other. However deeply I may feel aggrieved by the judgment that has been rendered against my settled convictions of justice and right, I shall not permit myself to indulge at present in any harsh and discourteous criticism of the motives of those who gave it. Conscious of the rectitude of my own motives, if not satisfied with the correctness of my judgment as to the members of the commission, I prefer not to think so poorly of my kind or so meanly of my countrymen as to express the belief that eight of the highest and most distinguished officers of the Government have willfully perverted the law they were solemnly sworn to administer with impartial fairness and outraged every principle of justice held sacred by the world of mankind. Though I am unable to perceive the logic or process of reasoning by which they reached their conclusions, and though I am unable to reconcile the conflict in the legal principles which seem to have guided them in determining the vote of Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon, I have in charity endeavored to conclude that in their consciences they did no violence to the law or the facts applicable to those States. But I cannot forbear an expression of the opinion that, had I occupied the place upon the commission filled by the distinguished statesman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] I should have hesitated very long before I would have permitted the sovereignty of that noble old Commonwealth to be stricken down and her people humiliated by having the hand of a pardoned convict cast their electoral vote in defiance of their will. The law would have had to be as inflexible as steel and the proof imbued somewhat with the sanctity of holy writ which could have influenced me to allow the voice of a felon bearing the brand of the laws, disgrace and disability, to ex press the pretended will of the people of Florida against their solemn protest and disclaimer.

If I had been a member of that commission, as was the gifted and scholarly gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I would never have allowed the vote of that empire State of the West to have been determined by a band of outcasts and adventurers against the indignant outcry of its gallant and patriotic citizens unless I had been driven to that ungrateful task by a conviction of right and a sense of duty so imperative and overwhelming that my conscience could not have resisted their command. Had I been in his position I should, it seems to me, have had to be environed by a net-work of legal restraints and an array of facts from which there was no avenue of escape for either my judgment or conscience before I would have cast over the people of Ohio or any other State of this Union the mantle of shame and humiliation which now hangs dark as the shadow of death over the people of Louisiana. With the foot of the usurper upon the necks of her people, with the hand of the robber in their treasury for ten years of disorder and pillage, bereft of their dearest rights, insulted by the stranger and adventurer and ruled by the thief and the plunderer, they present to-day the saddest mockery of free Government ever exhibited to the gaze of the world, while their sister States of Florida and South Carolina wear the same manacles which holds them in slavery.

When the electoral bill was passed, in the midst, as we then were, of a dangerous state of public excitement and party passion, and over the opposition of the more extreme elements in both political parties, I thought we had won the proudest and grandest triumph ever achieved by the wisdom and patriotism of the American people in all the annals of our history. It was a sublime effort to overcome passion and prejudice by moderation and prudence—a victory gained by concession and forbearance, born, as I thought, of the purest love of country and most exalted statesmanship, over that implacable spirit of party, which, unrestrained, would drift a free government into despotism or anarchy, disorder, and ruin. And while the hopes inspired by that victory have not been realized in all their brightness, yet they are not dead forever, and while the fruit we expected it to bear has lost some of its golden tint, yet it has not, I trust, wholly crumbled into dust and ashes.

The scenes exhibited in this Hall while that struggle was being waged were never witnessed before in the legislative councils of any nation or people on earth. The fervid eloquence with which the most gifted orators and distinguished leaders of both political parties, from every section of the country, urged the support of a measure which was to bring peace and the reign of law to a country so long wearied with disorder, will live in history, the admiration of their countrymen, long after their names shall have been inscribed upon the honored roll of departed statesmen.

I can but feel more than a mere partisan regret that the results of their efforts, so far as they are yet developed, however honorably they may have been attained in the judgment of those who have accomplished them, have not met the sanction and approval of a larger number of the American people. But, however much the body they created may have betrayed its trust or fallen short of the demands of justice and public expectation, and however great the wrong it has wrought for the present, yet it may serve to teach a useful lesson and bring some benefits in the future. Our action in this matter has, I trust, already impressed upon the public mind the assurance and conviction, not before felt, that no question, however complicated and dangerous, can ever arise in the administration of our Government which may not be solved by peaceful, constitutional, and lawful means. It is full time we were learning that violence and disorder can bring no blessing, and that national prosperity and individual happiness can only be secured under the reign of peace and the supremacy of law. If we could but learn that higher and nobler lesson in political wisdom, that broader view of statesmanship that condemns the party creed which is based alone upon sectional hatred and animosities, we would indeed leave behind us many evils of the past and enter with brighter hopes upon the second centennial of our national existence.

If the work of the electoral commission has failed in all else of good, it has at least served the purpose and furnished the occasion of vindicating the character and patriotism of the southern people, of refuting the imputations of their enemies upon their integrity and loyalty to the Government, and of bringing to shame their ungenerous accusers. For ten years of political proscription the wicked and unfounded charge that the rebel democracy were seeking political power for dishonorable and unpatriotic purposes, and that the rebels and traitors of the South were conspiring to compass the overthrow of the Government, has not only been proclaimed by the party demagogue and political menial in every popular election, but it has been only too often repeated in this Hall by those whose positions should have raised them above the influence of feelings so revengeful and malignant and that are so little in accord with the calm dignity which should mark the deportment of the statesman and legislator.

That the southern people have sometimes been restive under the infliction of repeated and unmerited wrongs, and that sometimes, impelled by the instincts of self-preservation, they have broken over legal restraints which they would otherwise have observed, may be true; but under the circumstances that surrounded them, and the multiplied iniquities which angered and exasperated them, I declare it as my solemn belief that no other portion of the American people would have exhibited the same moderation that they have. Suppose the people of Maine or Massachusetts, or of any other State of the North, had been held in the strong grasp of Federal power while they were overrun and plundered by a horde of fugitives and adventurers from every quarter of the world, more brutal than Goths in their instincts, and more remorseless than Vandals in their greed, would they not have shaken off the shackles that held them in subjection to these cormorants and brought swift retribution upon their oppressors, though they had brought destruction upon themselves? When the sturdy, honest yeomanry of New England shall see political brigands and public plunderers sitting in the high places that were wont to be filled by the most distinguished of their fellow-citizens, and shall be compelled to behold the ermine of justice worn by the ignorant charlatan, and their laws administered by corrupt and mercenary knaves, and then be told that they must admit them to their household, bear witness to their virtue, and do honor to their character, they will rise up and destroy them, if they have not lost that spirit of fearless manhood and ardent love of liberty which they inherited from their ancestors. And yet the people of the South have suffered all these things, and more, under a Government which they have just assisted to save, at the risk of being compelled for four years longer to submit to this bitter shame and humiliation. Will their countrymen longer misjudge them? Will even their political foes longer distrust their devotion to the public good, revile their actions, or judge harshly of their conduct and motives?

If they committed a folly, even a great crime, if you will, when they sought to withdraw from the Federal Union and establish a government for themselves, surely they have suffered in bitterness and anguish a fearful penalty, and their most relentless enemy, if a brave and generous one, would scarcely wish to deal them another blow. The republican party claims to have overcome them in war, and assumes to itself the honor of saving the Government from their efforts to destroy it. If this be true, they can the more easily afford, now that the war is over and their victory is complete, to exhibit toward their vanquished foemen something of the chivalry that makes the true soldier delight in generous deeds. They can and ought to be as manly in peace as they claim to have been in war, and accord to their late adversaries as civilians some of the respect which they showed them as soldiers. Had this been done, when the war was ended every legitimate result of that war could have been secured without inflicting another wrong, without arousing another angry passion, and without exciting a single act of opposition or murmur of complaint from the people of the South.

But a different policy was pursued. The gallant men who had fought to a successful conclusion a great civil war for the maintenance of the Union, at its end gladly laid aside the implements of the soldier and retired to the quiet pursuits of peaceful life, leaving their unfortunate adversaries the prey of dastards, who skulked from danger in the hour of strife, and only rushed into combat to strike a disarmed and fallen foe. Far better would it have been for the country if the soldiers who fought the great battles which fixed our theory of government had been permitted to sit together in legislative council and devise the method of reconstructing and building up again our shattered political system. Wise men would have considered the causes which led to the war, and sought to understand the feelings of the southern people before they would have entered upon a policy toward them which has not only inflicted so many evils upon the present, but has planted the seeds of hostility to the Government in generations which are to come. Is it not time to pause and inquire whether or not this policy has been just in the past or if it would be wise to continue it in the future? What it has already accomplished is seen in the overthrow of free and honest government in great States of this Union, in the humiliation and estrangement of their people, and the disorder and confusion which for ten years have prevailed in their midst.

Is it not quite time we were being governed in our public conduct by some of the lessons taught in the history of other nations and other people? What good is expected to be accomplished by keeping alive the fires of sectional hatred and giving constant vitality and increased intensity to animosities engendered by our civil strife? Will our nation grow greater, or our people more happy under the reign of passions and prejudices which should have perished with the restoration of peace between the two sections of the Union? Can it be expected to win the loyalty and affections of a people by persecution and proscription? Is England greater to-day, or Ireland more loyal to its government, because Emmett perished upon the scaffold, and Mitchell, Meagher, and the hundreds of other patriots were exiled from their homes to live among strangers? Did the throne of the Bourbons stand more firmly after they and their allies had sent the great Napoleon to die in the solitude of Saint Helena? Would it detract anything from the greatness of the Prussian Empire if Carl Schurz were recalled to his native land and made the colaborer of Bismarck, the illustrious chancellor of that great government? Who can doubt that the prosperity and well-being of our whole country, both the North and the South, can only be secured by a generous, liberal, and enlightened policy that will enlist the co-operation and aid of every class of our people?

To the gentlemen of the republican party I have a few words to say. By appliances rendered necessary by a condition of danger in our public affairs, for which your party is responsible, you have been enabled to win a great party victory and to secure the inauguration of your candidate for President of the United States; though the American people do not and will not believe that he is elected by a majority of their votes. But I assisted in constructing the legal machinery by which this result was attained, and I feel bound, as do the southern people, to stand by it with inflexible firmness, though it should be the means of holding some of them for four more years in the grasp of a power inexorable as fate and pitiless as death. The victory which you have thus gained for your party, however discreditably it was won, may, if wisely used, bring more blessings to your country than any triumph you have ever achieved. You may by a generous magnanimity make those whom you have hated and reviled feel that they are at least the equals of all other American citizens in the administration of public laws and in the guardianship of the nation's honor. They have shown you in the most dangerous crisis through which this Government has ever passed that they are capable of sacrificing every personal resentment for the peace, tranquillity, and safety of the country. They have proven to you and the world that they will abide in good faith the decision of a tribunal which has disappointed their most cherished hopes and robbed them of their dearest rights, because it was made under the provisions of a law which they were honorably bound to observe.

Within a short time Mr. Hayes will be clothed with the power and dignity of the Chief Ruler of this, the foremost nation upon earth. With what wisdom and justice he will administer his high trust and discharge the solemn duties of that exalted station, I do not know and cannot predict. I am glad to believe that there are some among those who have a party claim to direct and influence his action who are not wanting in the attribute of statesmanship and the impulses of patriotism which would raise them above that ignoble ambition that would bring ruin to the country to give strength and power to their party. If their utterances upon this floor are to be trusted, they have given to me an assurance that the country will not be wholly disappointed in the hope of a better and purer administration of public affairs than we have had for many years of our past history. I listened with pleasure to the generous and manly declaration of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] sounding so strangely coming from that side of the House, that henceforth the Southern States were not to be treated as foreign provinces nor their people held as conquered subjects; but that the flag of the nation should wave over a restored Union of equal States, of loyal and contented citizens. Let me say to that gentleman that sentiments like those he so eloquently expressed would more likely win the hearts of southern people than if he were to deck them with political honors, give them all the patronage of the Government, and fill their coffers with wealth.

If Mr. Hayes were here I should say to him that the few generous words of his friend as well as the altered tone of the organ of his party in this city has done more to allay the spirit of opposition and give him an unobstructed path to the White House than all the clamor and denunciation of his less generous and magnanimous followers. If, when invested with the honors which await him, he should be governed by these high principles and patriotic aims he will prove to the world that fortune has not bestowed her smiles upon a totally unworthy favorite, and though he will not win the political alliance of the southern people for his party, he may win their support for his administration of the Government, their confidence and respect for himself.

Electoral Vote of Oregon.

SPEECH OF HON. LA FAYETTE LANE,

OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the Oregon electoral vote.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative from the State of Oregon I deem it my duty to submit in brief, as limited by the law under which we are acting, my views relative to the Oregon electoral vote. It would be my pleasure, and I surely would esteem it my duty, were the time adequate, to vindicate in every regard the character of Governor Grover as well as the conclusion to which he arrived when he issued the certificates to the true electors of the State of Oregon. His personal character where he is known is above attack, suspicion, or reproach. His official character has been amply and gratifyingly vindicated by the esteem and confidence reposed in him by the citizens of the State of Oregon. Twice has that State selected him to the highest position known to its form of government, and but recently have we selected him to one of the most honorable positions known to our Federal system. Whatever may be the criticisms, no matter how unfriendly, as to his action in issuing the electoral certificate, now the subject for consideration, certain am I that he was never influenced by any motive that would not illustrate the intelligence and purity of a statesman and a patriot. He understood his duty, and conscientiously performed it as he understood it.

On the 7th day of November, 1876, the qualified voters of the State of Oregon chose the electors who were to cast the vote thereof for President and Vice-President as required by the Constitution. At that time there were nine candidates soliciting their suffrages, representing the three aspirants for presidential honors, of which number there were but eight who were eligible under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of the laws of Oregon. Of those who received votes was one J. W. Watts. This individual at the time voted for was absolutely disqualified from being appointed an elector, he at that time being a postmaster in the town of La Fayette, Yamhill County, Oregon, a Federal office embraced within the contemplation of article 2 of the Constitution of the United States.

That this man Watts held such Federal office is a matter of official record, and concerning which there is no dispute. That that fact was generally known in the State of Oregon is also indisputable. That the holding of that office was a disqualification may not have been so generally understood, albeit I apprehend it was sufficiently well known. The doctrine of "ignorantia legis neminem excusat" may not in some cases be applicable, but I do protest that it should be applied most strictly in the selection of the Chief Magistrate of the United States. The purpose of our fathers in eliminating from the selection of such an officer every influence of an extraneous and improper character, such as might be developed by the exercise of Federal influence, is apparent to every one who understands the theory upon which our Government was founded.

The selection of an elector is exclusively a matter under the control and regulation of the State governments as to the mode and manner thereof, the qualification, however, being defined and limited by the Constitution of the United States, a prominent disqualification being that referred to—he cannot hold a Federal office. There is a provision that no person can be President unless he be a natural-born citizen. If Mr. Hayes was a native of Dahomey he would be as well qualified to be President as was this man Watts to be an elector; the selection of the one to the highest office would be no greater violation of our fundamental law, or the spirit thereof, than the utilizing of the other to contribute to that result.

The duty of the governor of Oregon was to grant certificates to those who were duly elected. Now, then, nobody could be elected unless he was embraced within the qualification of the Constitution. Therefore Governor Grover could not, and thank God did not, issue a certificate to this disqualified individual. It was not a ministerial duty the governor performed, but it was one imposed upon him in his executive capacity. Had he done else than take cognizance of the disqualification of Watts he would have violated his oath of office and would have been a perjurer, both morally and legally.

The law of the State of Oregon provides that the votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed the same as for members of Congress. The governor alone can grant certificates to members of Congress. He shall issue a certificate to the person having the highest number of votes. The word person can only mean one who is qualified to be voted for. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. To give such lists any character or validity whatever they must be signed by the governor and secretary. Such certificate or list was duly prepared and by the secretary of state delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting, on the first Wednesday of December last.

There is no certificate, no list containing the name of one J. W. Watts, who pretends to be an elector, signed by the governor of Oregon.

Any list of the votes cast, although certified by the secretary of state, without having the governor's signature, has neither significance in fact nor validity in law.

The resignation of Watts on the 13th day of November last can in no way relieve against the disabilities existing on the day of election. By the law of Oregon electors are chosen by the direct vote of the people. By act of Congress they are to be appointed in each State on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President. (United States Revised Statutes, page 131.) Watts was appointed on that particular day, if at all; he could not be appointed if not eligible. He was not eligible, and therefore was not appointed. It is a favorite practice of some of the voters of my State to manifest their appreciation of the majesty and grandeur of Mount Hood and at each election cast a ballot or so for that magnificant mountain. Had this object of peculiar admiration by chance received a majority of the votes cast for presidential electors would anybody contend that the governor should have issued a certificate in accordance with such votes? Certainly not, and yet Watts, though perhaps somewhat less colossal in structure, was none the less constitutionally disqualified than this most charming feature of our common mother.

So thus rests the case. The governor issued certificates to the three highest eligible candidates—Cronin, Cartwright, and Odell; the two last named positively refused to act with Mr. Cronin. As an elector he was required to perform a certain and very high duty. Being wholly ignored by his associates on the certificate he proceeded in the only manner to which in law he could resort. He filled a vacancy by the appointment of Mr. Miller, and they supplied the remaining vacancy by the appointment of Mr. Parker, and thereupon regularly and in due form of law proceeded to perform the duties of their office. If the State of Oregon has any voice in the electoral college it is expressed by the Cronin return. If that be rejected, we are disfranchised, If the other vote be accepted, the Constitution is violated and law and reason and logic are wholly disregarded.

It may be, but I am inclined to doubt it, that a majority of the people of my State preferred Mr. Hayes for President. There was a constitutional method of expressing their wish, which in part they saw fit to disregard. It was their fault, and not the fault of the law, if their wish was not fully granted. I beg that you in no spirit of mere romantic chivalry suffer an infringement of the Constitution. It is the pillar of light erected by our forefathers to guide our footsteps; it alone can maintain and preserve us a Union, a union of hearts as well as a union of States, inviolable and inseparable power. Violate that sacred instrument under any circumstances, and you will have made a dangerous if not fatal assault upon the liberties of the American people.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN D. WHITE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, "Hayes has received 185 votes and is elected," is the verdict of the compromise electoral commission. Who would have thought it? Was not the electoral commission created to give Tilden a chance? Why, Hayes had 185 votes on the 6th day of December, 1876. Certainly he did not need any commission. If Tilden had nothing to gain by submitting his case to a jury of fifteen men, for what purpose was the electoral commission created? Mr. Tilden's New York lawyer, of great fame as a pleader for criminals, was eager for the passage of the compromise electoral bill. With anxious eye he watched the disappearance of the American flag, which was to him a signal of the passage of the bill. Rising in his place thus he soliloquized:

> There it floated all through the night watches, till the daylight came, and as the sun rose over the snow, lighting up the Capitol from basement to dome, the flag was furled, and I knew the day was won.

Likewise did Mr. Tilden's Kentucky mouthpiece and nominating-convention boss, who is so handsomely described by the successor of the late and lamented Speaker from Indiana as—

> The distinguished member from the proud old Commonwealth of Kentucky, [Mr. WATTERSON,] who so readily assumes the chameleon hues of the hour, and who on the historic 8th of January, now doubly renowned, startled the radicals and himself by announcing that on the 4th of March there would be present at the National Capitol, to insure and enforce the claims of certain gentlemen to Cabinet positions one hundred thousand stern-visaged men in buckram, and who afterward
> "Threw down his target and his plaid;"
> and, admitting he had been engaged in a game of "brag," declared that for the purposes of a fight—
> "The democratic party is as one who has his right arm tied behind him. If forced into civil war it would proceed under the greatest disadvantages."
> Then "before taking" and gathering his robes about him, as the Roman senator was wont to draw his toga more gracefully to his shoulders when about to assume his native dignity, he majestically said:
> "I shall not undertake to add to the law of the case. It seems to me that an eminent jurist in the Senate [Mr. EDMUNDS, a republican] has made it perfectly clear that this bill is constitutional. I accept and adopt his views without reservation."

In like manner also did the distinguished bondholder and wire-worker, [Mr. HEWITT,] who was the chairman of Mr. Tilden's national executive committee for buying mules in Indiana, &c.

Distinguished democratic leaders and United States Senators, as BAYARD and THURMAN, not only favored but actually urged the passage of this unconstitutional bill.

In short, we were told that unless we passed this bill some dreadful calamity would befall our helpless country; perhaps my colleague with Southern Pacific Railroad tendencies and "C. J." scribbling propensities might march upon Washington at the head of 100,000 "unarmed men" to secure the inauguration of "his man" who once had a "bar'l of money."

See how he magnifies his own rage and attempts to dupe his Kentucky readers by an editorial on January 2, 1877, from which the following is an extract:

> And the people will be true to themselves, and their representatives will be true to their trust. Any man who says that they are ready to condemn the exhibition of armed force, if that be the only remedy left against flagrant usurpation, fails to appreciate the determined spirit that actuates the conservative masses of this country. Any man who says that the people will stand by and let a handful of conspirators interpret the prescribed form of the Constitution to suit their own unlawful purposes does not understand the reverence for established usage that imbues the mind of the American citizen.

Evidently this gentleman "smelt the battle from afar" during the late unpleasantness, and never realized "the conservative influence of a fifteen-inch shell."

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that some men talked of war, and threats of "Tilden or fight," "Tilden or blood" occasionally found expression. Certain reckless newspapers loaded their columns with inflammatory articles, and as a consequence certain office-seekers, idlers, and croakers met in various places throughout the country to indignate and make themselves miserable. Of course all such inflammatory articles and incendiary meetings had their effect upon the business of the country, and as an antidote for any such evil I offered the following resolution, which the House did itself the honor to adopt, January 16, 1877:

Whereas fears are entertained by a large number of American citizens lest there shall not be a peaceful settlement of the questions arising from the late election for President of the United States.

And whereas it pleased the founders of the Republic in ordaining and establishing the Constitution of the United States to make provision for the election of a President of the United States of America;

And whereas the Constitution provides for the counting of the electoral votes and the determining of who is elected President of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That any attempt, come from whatever source it may, to prejudice or excite the public mind in advance of the decision of the authority known to and provided for in the Constitution of the United States is unwise, unpatriotic, and full of danger to our free institutions; and that we deprecate all efforts to excite public passions as tending to increase the embarrassment and depression of the business interests of the country, and declare it to be the duty of all good citizens to peaceably and faithfully abide by the results reached in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, I was opposed to the compromise bill. I thought that the Constitution provided for the emergency and that Congress had no power to act in the case. The idea that Congress could go behind the action of the returning board of a State in this Union of States was as new as it was undemocratic. Those who favored such a proposition have made a complete surrender of the doctrine of "State rights." And while I cannot believe that a State has a right to secede, yet I believe that a State has rights which are above and beyond the power of Congress. The power to control its own returns for presidential electors is one of those powers. We cannot go beyond the powers delegated to us as Representatives by the Constitution of the United States. All other powers are either lodged in the separate Legislatures of the several States or reserved in and by the people for themselves, who are the source and fountain of all the powers in this whole free country.

The tenth article of the amendments to the Constitution is:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

The power to go behind the returns of the presidential electoral vote of any State is not delegated to this democratic House nor to this Congress, nor to Congress and the President. Each State and the people of the State must settle this question for themselves.

After this, then, nothing remains but the counting of the votes and the announcing of the result according to the common-sense meaning of the twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which, briefly, is:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President; * * * they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

A distinguished and honorable democratic Senator and a member of the high electoral commission [Mr. BAYARD] months ago, and long before this controversy arose or was dreamed of, delivered this opinion:

Nowhere is the power given to either House of Congress to pass upon the election, either the manner or the fact, of electors for President and Vice-President; and if Congress or either House shall assume under the guise or pretext of telling or counting the vote to decide the fact of the election of the electors, then they will have taken upon themselves an authority for which I for one can find no warrant in the charter of our liberties.

Yet this democratic Senator and the learned Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] of the commission, find no difficulty, under the present appliances of the party lash, in "going back on" their own honest records made long ago when they were free from the influences which accompany a party strife. They now hold that Congress can and should go behind certain electoral returns from the States of Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina.

And because a majority of the electoral commission refused to receive evidence on this subject, clearly beyond their control, the following list of Senators and Representatives solemnly protest against the decision of the tribunal for which a great number of them voted. Did it occur to these gentlemen that they were signing away the most precious right of the several States? They may think lightly of it now, but when the excitement has passed away the fact will not be forgotten that certain gentlemen in both wings of this Capitol for party purposes have signed away the most precious of all State rights. The following is a list of their names:

Senators—W. H. Barnum, Connecticut; Chas. W. Jones, Florida; Francis Kernan, New York; Frank Hereford, West Virginia; Henry Cooper, Tennessee; Lewis V. Bogy, Missouri; Wm. W. Eaton, Connecticut; S. The day will come again when these gentlemen, or rather the party to which they belong, will turn away from the democratic doctrine of to-day and go back to that of Charles Pinckney uttered seventy-seven years ago, as follows:

Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I will remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses, and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes of the electors so transmitted.

It never was intended, nor could it have been safe, in the Constitution, to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote, or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given.

This right of determining on the manner in which the electors shall vote; the inquiry into the qualifications, and the guards that are necessary to prevent disqualified or improper men voting, and to insure the votes being legally given, rests and is exclusively vested in the State Legislatures.

If it is necessary to have guards against improper elections of electors and to institute tribunals to inquire into their qualifications, with the State Legislatures, and with them alone rests the power to institute them, and they must exercise it. To give to Congress, even when assembled in convention, a right to reject or admit the votes of States would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of. How could they expect that in deciding on the election of a President, particularly where such election was strongly contested, that party spirit would not prevail and govern every decision? Did they not know how easy it was to raise objections against the votes of particular electors, and that in determining upon these it was more than probable the members would recollect their sides, their favorite candidate, and sometimes their own interests?

They will also agree with some of the rest of us that while there was no authority and no necessity for the electoral commission, yet its decisions were sound. As an example, let the following suffice:

The brief ground of this decision is that it appears upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Louisiana, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law; and the commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning officers for elections in the said State, prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not; or that the determination of the said returning officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact—the commission by a majority of votes being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President to enter upon a trial of such question.

The commission by a majority of votes is also of opinion that it is not competent to prove that any of said persons so appointed electors as aforesaid held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time when they were appointed, or that they were ineligible under the laws of the State or any other matter offered to be produced aliunde the said certificates and papers.

The commission is also of opinion by a majority of votes that the returning officers of election who canvassed the votes at the election for electors in Louisiana were a legally constituted body by virtue of a constitutional law, and that a vacancy in said body did not vitiate its proceedings.

Judge Church, a democrat and the chief-justice of the court of appeals of the State of New York, on the 10th February, 1877, said:

I have always expressed the opinion that the authentication of the election of presidential electors, according to the laws of each State, is final and conclusive, and that there exists no power to go behind them.

Let us all hope that the prophecy by the learned and eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made upon this floor may at an early day be fulfilled.

Mr. HOAR said:

Mr Speaker, prophecy is not one of the exact sciences. In my humble judgment any democrat conversant with the history of his own party will be pretty likely to assent to that proposition. [Laughter.] But I will venture a prophecy; and that is, that there will not be an event in the history of this country which in the future will be more gratifying to the American people than the constitutional assertion of the limit between State and national authority which this electoral commission has made; and that the previous declarations of Mr. BAYARD and Mr. THURMAN made in their places in the Senate when there was no presidential question in dispute will be those which they and their associates will most delight to remember. I do not speak now of the jurists or the legal profession of the country. I do not look for my reputation in this matter to my republican associates. I am willing to take my luck with the democratic party. This decision is in the line not only of its past precedents, but of all its future interests. If they disapprove and condemn it under the excitement of to-day, I will appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. I will appeal from the democratic party, excited by the desire of power, maddened by an earnest contest for political supremacy, drunk, some of them, with eagerness for the spoils—I will appeal from the party maddened, excited, drunk, in the present, to its future, and to its past. [Applause.]

The democratic party everywhere approves and vindicates the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. In view of this fact how humiliating to every American citizen the report made by Mr. JOYCE of the committee sent by this House to investigate affairs in Louisiana. Mr. JOYCE said:

Mr. Speaker, tongue cannot utter, pen cannot describe, pencil cannot paint, the imagination cannot conceive of the terror and consternation which filled the minds of the colored people in the bull-dozed parishes of Louisiana during the late political campaign. None who have not seen it can realize or even fully believe it.

But, sir, the facts exist and thousands of American citizens in the South are to-day as fully and completely disfranchised by fear as they were by law when offered for sale upon the auction-block or crouching in fear in the slave-pens.

In view then, sir, of the startling disclosures which have been made in this investigation, is it not time for the loyal and patriotic men of this country to arouse from their lethargy, crush out this spirit of tyranny, protect the sacredness of the ballot-box, and preserve the purity of the elective franchise?

Is it, sir, to be tolerated that in these United States any illegitimate organization of armed men, acting in sympathy, open and avowed, with a great political party, shall seize upon the public highway, establish illegal military control of a whole parish, stop travelers on the public road by armed force, close access to the polls to peaceable citizens, domineer over the right of election, and shoot to death all who decline to submit to their villainous tyranny?

Is it to be tolerated that murder shall be a recognized part of the machinery of politics, and that terror is the best ally of democratic reform? That force, unmeasured and unrestrained, is the substitute for law? That reason shall be dethroned by passion, and the regular course and progress of legal rights become the prey of evil and unregulated malice, with no limit but the will of the tyrant mob, which makes and executes at once its own wild and bloody decrees?

* * * * * * * *

In justice to one class of white people in Louisiana, I am frank to say that to all appearances they are intelligent, high-minded, and worthy men, and that I cannot and do not believe that they would be guilty, personally, of such crimes and acts of violence as are conceded to have been committed in that State during the past ten years.

But, sir, how are these men to avoid the awful responsibility which follows, even if they did not in fact hold the knife and the pistol, when they stand quietly by while others commit them, without raising voice or hand against it, and complacently and gracefully share in the spoils and profit by the results?

These men have lived in Louisiana during these terrible and bloody years; the men who have covered the land with desolation and death are their neighbors and kinsmen. They cannot plead ignorance or imbecility; the knowledge of every murder and act of violence has been brought home to their very doors. They have known that the object of it all has been to disfranchise the colored people and restore the democratic party to power.

The colored people of the South to-day represent thirty-five electoral votes. These the democratic party propose to steal by denying them the right of free suffrage as guaranteed to them by the Constitution.

All this is laid at their door and charged to their account, and the American people demand by the same voice which will place Rutherford B. Hayes in the presidential chair that they cease their cry of republican fraud, corruption, and military despotism, and turn their attention to the cleansing and purifying of their own party, to stopping the murder of innocent men for opinion sake, and restoring order, justice, and law among their own people. They must take the power into their own hands; suppress and punish the maraunding bands and armed banditti which infest the State; set up the standard of law and order, and restore the lawful authority of the government; and then, and not until then, will they have or deserve to have the sympathy and assistance of the loyal and patriotic people of this country.

And now, Mr. Speaker, besides attending to the presidential dispute, what has this House accomplished? Very little, if anything. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and by its record the majority in this House stands condemned before the country.

More than a year ago it began its political campaign for power in the Government of this country. "Retrenchment and reform" was the cry of those who foretold, foresaw, and labored for the downfall of the republican party.

With an abandon that amounted to madness, their retrenchment theory was carried so far that every department of the Government was seriously crippled; the Army was reduced; the Navy allowed to go down under the decaying agencies of time; foreign ministers and consuls were called home; forty-four American flags which had floated to the breeze in foreign lands as a symbol of our power and good will were hauled down, furled, and brought home; pensioners go unpaid, because there is no appropriation to complete the examination of their cases; for a like reason claims for commissary and quartermaster stores remains unsettled and unpaid; new post-routes are rendered inoperative and the old ones are shorn of their usefulness. Ah, yes, this is retrenchment with a vengeance. "The Lord reward you according to your works."

Reform! Reform! Reform! was in the heart of every enemy to republicanism, and on the lips of every democratic politician, demagogue, and office-seeker. Charges, whether true or false, were in demand. The President must be impeached. The Secretaries of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior Departments must be proven guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. The character of prominent men in the republican party must be blasted; and accordingly a premium was offered for whatever promised to evince that the republican party and its leaders were corrupt and rotten to the core. Every whisper of slander was repeated. The testimony of escaped lunatics, and the lies of disappointed, dismissed, and disgraced office-seekers were sounded from one end of the country to the other in the interest of democratic reform. No man was above suspicion; and the purer his life and the higher his character the more potent were the reasons for his disgrace and downfall. It was sufficient that democratic reform and democratic success demanded it. To accomplish such nefarious purposes witnesses were called to Washington and their expenses paid out of the public Treasury. Not only so, but cases are not wanting where rebutting and counteracting testimony has been circumvented by appointing to salaried positions such of your witnesses as preferred to be in contempt of this House rather than testify to the damnable trick to which you have resorted for the accomplishing of your hellish plans.

You talk about retrenchment! What man among you all has proposed to reduce his own salary? You cut off some of the necessary expenses of the Government and call that retrenchment; but I call it a false notion of economy which cripples the machinery of the people's Government. The people gain nothing by such economy, and you know it. The thinking classes of our people will not be slow to see through such flimsy demagoguery. You have not reduced the people's taxes one dime. You have not attempted to reduce taxes or the tariff. Yes, the democratic party is a reform party. It has resorted to every mean trick and corrupt practice known to Tammany politicians to bring about a reform that would place Tilden and men of his ilk in power in this country. It was well known that Tilden was worth millions of money, and that he was ready and willing to make any sacrifices which would tend to put him in the White House. Accordingly he was nominated by the bought-up democratic press in spite of the repeated declarations of the Cincinnati Enquirer and other respectable democratic newspapers, that—

Tilden's surroundings are bad. If elected, he would take to the White House the worst set of political jobbers and thieves ever seen in Washington, and that is saying a good deal. It could not but be that a man educated in cunning, in hypocrisy, in iniquity, nominated in corruption and shameless effrontery, even though his millions could elect him, would give us the most corrupt administration the country has ever known.

This statement might have been forgotten had it not been more than justified by recent developments. At least two attempts were made to purchase a republican elector to vote for this sharp, shrewd, ambitious, and unscrupulous politician. Eight thousand dollars were sent to Oregon, and the money that purchased Cronin has been traced to Mr. Tilden's door. I thank God that up to this hour no member on this floor has been so regardless of truth and his own honor, as to intimate that R. B. Hayes has during the entire campaign stooped to any low, tricky, or corrupt act.

Ay, the democratic party is for reform, that reform that brings with it "the loaves and the fishes." To secure this boon there has been no end to fraud, corruption, and false accusations. You have attempted to steal whole States. You did buy Cronin for the sum of $3,000 and after you got him he profited you nothing. He stands condemned by his own testimony.

Upon this point, that Cronin's own version may be seen, I quote from his testimony. After describing the situation of the parties in the room of the electoral college, those present, &c., Mr. Cronin said:

After we had taken seats as I have described, Mr. Cartwright demanded those certificates of me. I told him he should not have them. He remarked, "We have as much right to those as you have, and there are two of us, and we have a right to those certificates, and we want them." I repeated again that he should not have them; that the certificates were of no use any way except to attach to our return. He replied to that, as near as I can recollect, "We want those certificates, and why don't you give them to us?" I replied by saying, "I don't think you intend to treat me fairly. In the first place here is a United States marshal who takes possession of the college; then Mr. Odell takes the key; and you might as well understand first as last that you shall not have those certificates." About that time, I think, Dr. Watts got up and read his resignation, and his resignation was accepted and he was elected to fill that vacancy, as they called it. I then remarked, "Gentlemen, you refuse to act with me?" I am quite positive that Mr. Odell said, "You give us those certificates; we have got nothing to act on; we want those certificates," or words to that effect. I suppose I might as well say here that I did not hear Mr. Cartwright or Mr. Odell in terms refuse to act with me.

* * * * * * * *

Q. Why did you not produce the certificates and put them on the table?

A. Because I did not propose that Mr. Cartwright, Mr. Odell, or Mr. Watts should get those certificates.

Q. Did you not consider that Mr. Cartwright and Mr. Odell had as much right to them as you had.

A. Certainly.

Q. Why did you not put them on the table before them?

A. Because if I had put those certificates on the table or had given those certificates either to Mr. Odell or Mr. Cartwright or Dr. Watts, I suspected they would do just what they did do, and I should be left without a certificate. The certificates made out in proper order would have been returned to President FERRY with their proceedings and that would have been recognized in preference to any other.

Q. Still I ask you if you did not feel bound to obey the majority of the electors known to be elected, when they asked you to put the certificates on the table?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you think you had a right to take them away from the majority?

A. The question of right did not enter into that as much as the question of expediency.

From this it would seem that Mr. Cronin was not acting from a sense of right or duty, but solely from considerations of expediency.

To prove the utter worthlessness of Cronin's vote I need only state the fact that not one Senator—not even a democrat, not one—voted to receive Cronin's vote for Tilden and Hendricks. Every Senator admitted that Oregon should be counted for Hayes.

Mr. Speaker, there is something marvelous, almost miraculous, about the accomplishment of this defeat of the democratic party.

The republican party has been thoroughly and severely tried, and when we consider the many narrow escapes from our wary enemy I cannot but think that our final triumph is traceable to agencies higher than human. If we had lost a single point we had surely failed. But we gained every point. The electoral commission was your creature. But it did good work for the cause of truth and justice and humanity.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] puts it nicely, thus:

Partisanship is the crime of the commission. Is it not curious that while the supposed partisanship of the eight who concur is denounced there is a silence profound as the hush of death as to the at least equal partisanship of the seven who dissent? No one upon this side has uttered a word of censure of these seven, for no doubt they acted, as did their associates, upon an honest conviction, and were guided by a high sense of duty as they comprehend its dictations to them.

Sir, we have to-day been regaled not only with these expressions of impotent anger, but filibuster has been called in to aid those who cannot accept defeat. I am not surprised at this, nor at the chagrin and natural wrath of our democratic friends, for with everything to gain and nothing to lose they cunningly set a trap and were themselves caught; caught by the act of God, who disposes of all human events, and by the act of the Illinois Legislature, which disposed of Judge Davis. [Laughter.]

They digged a pit, they digged it deep,
They digged it for their brother;
But through their sin they did fall in
The pit they digged for 'tother.

[Renewed laughter.]

Here again "He that ordereth all things well" put it into the hearts of a sufficient number of the majority on this floor to enable us to crush out the revolutionary efforts of the obstructionists and filibusters.

Surely an all-wise Providence watches over the affairs of men, and controls the destinies of nations.

Hayes and Wheeler have been elected and will be inaugurated. Peace and prosperity will bless our country. Business will revive, and every good citizen will go to work with a light heart and bright hopes for the future. The Republic still lives, and republican principles of liberty, freedom, and equality are forever established in the hearts of the American people.

Before the scheming conglomerate mass known as the democratic party can ever secure control of this country it will be necessary for them to read understandingly the following chapter from Josh Billings:

Yung man, yu better be honest than cunning, and it iz hard work to be both.

Texas and Pacific Railroad.

SPEECH OF HON. F. LANDERS,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the amendment in the nature of a substitute to House bill No. 472, commonly known as the Texas and Pacific Railroad bill, which I have submitted for the consideration of the House, has been offered in no spirit of hostility to the project of constructing another railroad along a southern route from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. On the contrary, it embodies, as I believe, principles and measures far less open to objection, and consequently far better calculated to attain the end desired, than the original bill or any of its amendments presented to this House. I am not, Mr. Speaker, in favor of the Federal Government entering upon a general system of internal improvements; but there are certain improvements of a national character which are manifestly of vast importance to the Federal Government and the people at large, and which are far beyond the reach of private capital, that cannot possibly be undertaken and carried through successfully without the aid of the Federal Government being extended in some form. This distinction, and the policy which it implies, has been recognized and acted upon by the leading statesmen of all parties almost since the foundation of the Government, and with the most beneficial results. As early as 1806 Mr. Jefferson approved a bill passed by Congress to aid in the construction of a road from Cumberland to Wheeling. In 1817 Mr. Calhoun advocated in this body the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate the dividends and interest on the bonds of the United States Bank to the construction of roads and canals; again in 1835 he advocated the granting of aid to a road from Cincinnati to Chattanooga; and again in 1849 he advocated the principle of governmental aid to a Pacific road on the southern route.

In 1827 an act of Congress donated a million and a half of acres of land in aid of the Wabash and Erie Canal. The measure was supported by Benton, R. M. Johnson, Rufus King, Horatio Seymour, and others of like distinction. In 1850 Congress granted two and one-half million acres of land to aid the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad. The bill was introduced by Stephen A. Douglas, and received the support of Benton, Cass, Houston, Shields, King, and many others, distinguished alike for their great ability and strict construction of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government. The policy and results of these grants by Congress in new States and Territories are thus referred to by Robert McClelland, Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report of December 5, 1853:

There can be as little doubt of the constitutionality of such grants as of their propriety. The right to donate a part for the enhancement of the value of the residue can no longer be questioned. The principle has been adopted and acted upon for nearly thirty years. * * * It has been of incalculable importance to the great West, and either directly or indirectly to all the States.

In 1856 both of the great political parties of the day incorporated in their platforms a plank in favor of extending governmental aid to a railroad to the Pacific Ocean. Indeed, in February, 1855, a bill passed the Senate for the construction of three railroads to the Pacific—a Northern, a Southern, and a Central Pacific Railroad. I may add that up to the breaking out of the rebellion the construction of no less than three railroads, in order to do justice to all sections of the country alike, was almost universally advocated by those who sought to develop the immense resources of the interior of the continent and to bind together more firmly the various sections of our widely extended country. But the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861 put an end for a time to all hope of carrying out the original plan. The Union Pacific and the Central Pacific were, however, completed, and, notwithstanding the fact that their construction was attended with great speculation and fraud, they have proved of incalculable benefit to the nation at large.

It is true, to refer briefly to what followed, that the subsidizing of these roads by the Government led to a mania for building land-grant roads, which was encouraged by Congress in the most reckless and disgraceful manner. Railroad projects, both good and bad, were indiscriminately aided by Congress without the slightest regard to the character of the enterprises, the wants of the region which they proposed to traverse, or the interests of the nation at large; and dishonest men were enabled to swindle not only the Government but the people of this as well as foreign countries in the most shameful manner. It is not surprising, in view of these facts, that a strong prejudice exists in the minds of the people and of members of this House against the policy of the Government extending further aid to projects of a similar character. But no such considerations should be permitted to control our actions at the present time. The question is one of too much importance and too far-reaching in its consequences to be considered and disposed of lightly or with a prejudiced mind. It is within our power to open up to civilization a vast region, rich beyond calculation in natural resources, now occupied by the savage alone, and to add immensely to the wealth and prosperity of our people, without adding one iota to the burdens of Government, if a wise policy is pursued in the determination of this question.

I have no doubt whatever, Mr. Speaker, as to our constitutional right to aid a work of national importance, though I shall not go into any elaborate discussion of the question, but rely simply upon the fact to which I have already adverted, that the right has been recognized and acted upon since an early period in the history of the Government. It will be observed that the statesmen whom I have cited as favoring governmental aid to national projects all belonged to the school known as strict constructionists. Mr. Calhoun, who was noted in this respect, as chairman of a select committee of the Senate in 1845, to whom was referred a memorial from the Memphis convention, made an elaborate report, from which I take the following extract:

Your committee will next proceed to consider that portion of the memorial which relates to the communication by railroad between the valley of the Mississippi and the Southern Atlantic States. They regard works of the kind as belonging to internal improvements, (that is, improvements within the body of the States,) and as such are, in their opinion, not embraced in the power to regulate commerce. But they are, nevertheless, of opinion that where such roads or other works of internal improvement may pass through public lands, the United States may contribute to their construction in their character of proprietors, to the extent that they may be enhanced in price thereby. * * * That Congress has a right to make such contributions where there is reasonable ground to believe that the public lands will be enhanced in proportion, under its right to dispose of "the territory and other public property of the United States," your committee cannot doubt. In making this assertion, they hold to the rule of strict construction, and that this power, like all the other powers of the Government, is a trust power, and as such is strictly limited by the nature and object of the trust. In this case the rule requires that the lands and other public property of the United States should be disposed of to the best advantage; and where that can be done by contributing a portion to works which would make the residue equally or more valuable than the whole would be without it, as is supposed, they hold it would be strictly within the rule. Your committee go further. They are of the opinion not only that Congress has the right to contribute to the extent stated in such cases, but that it is in duty bound to do so, as the representative of a part of the proprietors of the land to be benefited. It would be neither just nor fair for it to stand by and realize the advantage they would derive from this work without contributing a due proportion toward its construction. It would be still less justifiable to refuse to contribute if its effect would be to defeat a work the construction of which, while it would enhance the value of the land belonging to the public and that of individual proprietors, would promote the prosperity of the country generally.

Assuming, therefore, that we not only have the right to aid works of national importance, but that, in cases where the Government is a part proprietor and the effect of the work is to promote the prosperity of the country generally, it is our duty to do so, it remains to be considered whether the construction of a railroad from the present terminus of the Texas and Pacific Railroad at Fort Worth to the Pacific Ocean is a work of national importance of the character described. When it is considered that the entire line yet to be constructed extends through an unsettled region, much the larger portion of which is owned by the Federal Government, I think there can be no doubt upon the subject. The vast region traversed by the projected road, now given over to solitude, would be speedily settled and the wealth of the nation be enormously increased by its construction. It would also open another great highway to the Pacific Ocean and increase the facilities of the nation for trading with the nations of the East, thus still further "promoting the prosperity of the country generally." To refer briefly to details, that portion of the road extending through the great and as yet but partially developed State of Texas will open up to the husbandman one of the richest and most inviting agricultural regions on the continent. Grains of all kinds can there be produced in larger quantities to the acre than in almost any other section of the country, while as a grazing region it is unsurpassed. Cotton, one of our leading exports, is also capable of being produced to an unlimited extent. Build this road and it will be but a short time until our annual crop of cotton will be doubled and contribute materially toward turning the balance of trade in our favor. This is a matter of no little importance in the present condition of the country.

After leaving the State of Texas the road traverses from east to west the extensive Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, whose mineral resources are believed, upon undoubted information, to surpass those of any other region known to civilization. Let this region once be thrown open to immigration and rich and prosperous States, contributing untold millions to the national wealth, will soon be added to our great confederacy. Surely this will be "promoting the prosperity of the country generally."

The trade of a large portion of old Mexico would also be secured by the construction of this road, which, although at our very doors, now tends to enrich foreign and distant nations. As already suggested, it would furnish the nation with another and more direct highway to the Pacific Ocean, and build upon its shores another great city to handle and distribute the increased products of our own and other nations.

There is still another consideration of great importance which should be mentioned in this connection. It is well known that in the regions to be traversed by this road the Government is unable to afford that protection to life and property which is the right of every citizen. Millions of dollars are spent annually in maintaining distant and isolated military posts without accomplishing the ends desired. There is no civilizer equal to the railroad. Let this road be built and industrious farmers, mechanics, and miners will be found making their homes along its line in sufficient numbers to protect themselves until civilization spreads over the entire region now occupied by the savage alone. Indeed, were the statistics at hand, I have no doubt they would show that in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona alone the Government has expended more money in a fruitless effort to protect their inhabitants than would construct and equip a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific, to say nothing about the loss of millions of dollars of private property, and of the lives of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of our hardy pioneers. It is the duty of the Government to afford protection to all of its citizens, and the means best calculated to secure that end ought unquestionably to be adopted.

If protection is thus extended and the region referred to is settled by means of the completion of the Texas and Pacific, the lands of the Government would find ready purchasers and the revenues of the Government be correspondingly increased, not only by the proceeds of the sale of its lands, but by the increased production of wealth, both mineral and agricultural, which would follow. In a large portion of the country traversed by the Texas and Pacific the Government is the sole proprietor, and its interests alone are promoted. If that be true, according to the rule laid down by Mr. Calhoun in the report from which I have quoted, "it would be neither just nor fair for the Government to stand by and realize the advantage it would derive from this work without contributing a due proportion toward its construction."

There cannot, I think, be any doubt in the minds of the members of this body in regard to the character of this project, but that all will, upon due reflection, agree with me that it is a work of national importance, and falls under that class of public improvements which for nearly half a century have been recognized by leading statesmen of all parties as being within the scope of the powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. That point settled, it only remains now to consider the several plans submitted to this House for extending governmental aid to this road, and for this purpose it is only necessary to examine the provisions of the original bill offered by the committee and the substitute which I have had the honor to submit for the consideration of the House. And I may remark at the outset that I have been obliged to offer a substitute instead of attempting simply to amend the original bill, because, as will be seen by an examination of the original bill and the substitute, they differ not only as to details, but as to the manner in which governmental aid should be extended to the project in the most radical manner.

The original bill seems to have been prepared with great care, with a view to protecting the Government and the people, so far as it is possible to protect them, under the plan of aiding the road as proposed in the bill. My objections go directly to the plan proposed. But before proceeding to discuss the merits and demerits of the plan I desire to call attention to two or three important objections to the original bill which have been avoided in the substitute. I allude, first, to the provision authorizing the construction of several branches, namely, one to New Orleans, one to Vicksburgh, and another to Memphis, and also one from Vinita, the present terminus of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, to a connection with the Texas and Pacific at the one hundredth degree of longitude. The three branches first named are all within the States, and in reality form no part whatever of a direct trunk line to the Pacific Ocean. They have all, I believe, been organized under State charters. However that may be, they all extend through old States, in which the Government has long since ceased to be a part proprietor of lands, and are clearly not entitled to Government aid under the principles which I have laid down as governing the action of Congress in cases of internal improvement of this character. With the same propriety Congress might be called upon to aid branches from Louisville, Cincinnati, or Charleston, thus committing the Federal Government to a system of general internal improvements in the construction of railroads not contemplated by the Constitution, and manifestly in direct violation of public policy.

The Atlantic and Pacific branch differs from the other branches in this, that it is not projected through any of the old States. It is proposed to extend it through the Indian Territory, which would render it necessary for the Government to extinguish the Indian title by purchase, thus adding to the liabilities to be assumed by the Federal Government. The Atlantic and Pacific does not necessarily form any part of a through trunk line to the Pacific Ocean, and as part of a branch to Saint Louis its construction is entirely unnecessary, for the reason that the extensive region of which that city is the commercial center already enjoys the advantages of two roads extending from Saint Louis to a connection with the Texas and Pacific west of the Mississippi River, namely, the Iron Mountain and Saint Louis Railroad and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad.

The estimated length of the several branches proposed is as follows: The New Orleans branch 337 miles, the Vicksburgh branch 100 miles, the Memphis branch 265 miles, and the Atlantic and Pacific branch 325 miles, or in the aggregate over one thousand miles, but little less than the whole number of miles of the main trunk line which yet remain to be constructed. To guarantee the interest on bonds payable fifty years after date, at the rate of $25,000 a mile, as is proposed, would require the Government to become responsible for the interest on $25,000,000 of bonds, which, at 5 per cent. per annum, would amount in fifty years to the large sum of $62,500,000, reckoned at simple interest, or if reckoned at compound interest, which would represent the actual loss to the Government if obliged to pay this interest, to the still larger sum of about $275,000,000. Apart from the constitutional objections and the objections on the grounds of public policy to which I have adverted the proposition that the Federal Government shall become responsible for the payment of this large sum in aid of branches that are in no sense works of national importance, and form no part of the main project, which is a work of national importance, should not be entertained by this House for one moment.

There is also another feature of the original bill open to serious objections which has been remedied by the substitute. I refer to the authority granted to the Southern Pacific (of California) to build that portion of the road which extends from a point one hundred miles west of El Paso to the Pacific coast, by way of Gorgonia Pass. At Fort Yuma, a point about two hundred miles east of San Diego, the Southern Pacific of California is authorized to divert the road from a direct course and build in a northwesterly direction to Gorgonia Pass, on the line of the Southern Pacific of California, to San Francisco. This is manifestly for the purpose of rendering the entire road tributary to the Southern Pacific of California and the city of San Francisco. It is true that the original bill provides for a branch from Gorgonia Pass to San Diego, but it is clearly a departure from the idea of a short and direct route to the Pacific Ocean, and militates against the theory of building up on the shores of the Pacific another great commercial city to handle and distribute the wealth which will seek this channel of trade. The proposed deflection in the line of road, by way of Gorgonia Pass, will add about one hundred miles to its length, which is, so far as I can learn, altogether unnecessary when the main object of constructing this road is considered. Besides this, it is well known that the Southern Pacific of California and the Central Pacific, which forms the western division of the Union Pacific Railroad to San Francisco, are identical in interest. The people of California and San Francisco, as well as the States and Territories along the fortieth and forty-first parallels of latitude, have had a transcontinental railroad constructed at the expense of the Federal Government; and the chief claims of the Texas and Pacific to Government aid are founded upon the theory that it will open up and develop an entirely new region of country, and when completed will constitute a rival and competing route to the Pacific Ocean. To place the western division of the Texas and Pacific under the control of the same parties that own and control the western division of the Union Pacific would hardly accord with the theory of establishing a competing line to the Pacific; it would be too much like turning over the lambs to the care of the wolves, and should be deemed by this House a fatal objection to the bill of the committee.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that to place this project upon a square, honest footing to entitle it to the consideration of this House as a work of national importance it must be divested of all entangling alliances, which are only calculated to surround it with suspicion and detract from its real merit. Such I have regarded the branches to Memphis, Vicksburgh, New Orleans, and Vinita, and the alliance with the Southern Pacific of California, which undoubtedly deprives the project of one of its most important features, namely, that of a competing road to the Pacific. For these and other reasons of a like nature I have provided in the substitute for the bill of the committee only for the construction of the main trunk line from Fort Worth to San Diego by what is known as the most direct route, a distance of less than fourteen hundred miles, and have left out the branches entirely, which diminishes the length of road to be subsidized over a thousand miles.

I now come to discuss the two plans of extending governmental aid to this project, and with all due deference to the opinions of others, I insist that the plan embodied in the substitute will be found to be so infinitely superior to that proposed by the committee that it cannot fail to commend itself to this House and to the country. Heretofore two methods of granting aid to works of internal improvement have invariably been adopted: one by donating public lands, the other by lending the credit of the Government in the form of interest-bearing bonds. Both of these methods have resulted in great abuses. When lands have been donated it has been found that, sooner or later, they were monopolized by the few and held for private speculation, thus preventing their occupancy by actual settlers and retarding the growth and development of the country. But there is another and a still stronger objection to this method, which also applies to the method of guaranteeing bonds. The corporations to whom lands have been donated have been enabled by such grants to negotiate bonds based upon them for capital bearing a high rate of interest, mostly abroad, with which to construct their roads. This has rendered our country tributary to other nations to an alarming extent. It is estimated that over one hundred million dollars' worth of the products of American industry are required each year to pay the annual interest on railroad securities alone, held abroad. The larger part of this immense amount might have been kept at home to further enrich our own people, had a wiser policy been pursued in the matter of aiding works of this character.

The method of aiding works of national importance by guaranteeing bonds is equally vicious. Its workings may be seen in the loan of $64,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds to the Union Pacific. The bonds are still outstanding, and the Government has already paid over $30,000,000 in interest, obtained from the people by taxation, and will be obliged to pay a great many millions more before it is released from responsibility on account of that road.

These methods, it will be observed, are indirect. The railroad companies thus aided cannot use either the lands or the bonds, but have to use them in procuring money. This is done by shinning through the markets of the world, at great expense, and obtaining the use of money at exorbitant rates of interest, which largely increases the cost of construction and renders cheap transportation an impossibility.

In the case under consideration the bill offered by the committee proposes to guarantee the interest, at the rate of 5 per cent. a year, on bonds of the company to the amount in round numbers of $70,000,000. The annual interest on that sum at 5 per cent. a year is $3,500,000, or for fifty years, the time the bonds have to run, $175,000,000. These bonds would undoubtedly sooner or later follow our other bonds to Europe, and eventually, whether paid by the company or the Government, would require this country to send products abroad to the full amount of both principal and interest, in all $245,000,000, to meet their payment. This is an absurd and ruinous method of raising money for enterprises of any kind, and it is high time for it to be stopped. It is this policy that is bankrupting all our railroads, as well as all other legitimate industries in the country, and which has rendered cheap transportation an impossibility. It is estimated that over two hundred million dollars' worth of the products of this country are required to be sent abroad each year to meet the interest on our various obligations held there. This, I repeat, is a fearful drain upon the labor and resources of the country.

Few people stop to consider the wonderfully rapid accumulation of money by means of interest. It is perfectly legitimate to reckon the accumulation of value at compound interest, for if the amount sent abroad in payment of interest was retained at home it would contribute to the increase of our own wealth in a corresponding degree. For example, let us take $1,000 and see what it will amount to in fifty years, the interest being added every six months.

One thousand dollars at 5 per cent. in 50 years will amount to $12,575.87.

The interest on $70,000,000, the amount which the Texas and Pacific company desire to borrow, would amount in fifty years, at compound interest, to an enormous sum many times greater than the principal.

I mention these facts for the purpose of calling attention to the accumulative power of capital in the form of money, as money is now instituted, by means of interest, and the false principle upon which the system is based. As money is now instituted it is something more than a mere tool of exchange, as it is described by the economists. A scarce metal is selected as the material out of which to make money, and one I may add that is relatively growing scarcer as population increases and society moves on; and not content with this, it is clothed with the sole power of legal tender, the most potent power known in the affairs of a civilized community. In this way money is endowed with supreme control over labor and all kinds of property, and its functions as a tool of exchange are totally perverted. Although a community may possess abundant resources as well as labor, nothing can be accomplished until capital in the form of money is employed. Money in the form of capital it is said represents past labor. Well, I would like to know why past labor should be considered any better, or entitled to any more rights, than present labor. Well-informed people, and even political economists, are in the habit of considering it a great advantage to us if we can borrow money abroad at a low rate of interest. They say it gives us what we most need, capital; and at the same time they entirely overlook the fact that we have a thousand times more capital in the form of natural wealth and labor going to loss before our eyes constantly, simply for the want of a tool of exchange to render it available. It is for reasons such as these that I am opposed to the Government ever issuing another bond, or encouraging corporations to do so, under the present false system of money and finance.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a way in which the Government of the United States can aid undertakings of national importance, not only without burdening either the Government or the people, but to the great and lasting advantage of both, and one which, I submit, is founded upon sound principles of finance as well as common sense. That way I have embodied in the substitute, which I have submitted for the consideration of this House, and I shall now proceed to discuss its merits in the briefest manner possible:

The first section of the substitute provides for the construction of the main trunk line from its present terminus at Fort Worth to San Diego by the shortest practicable route. The branches provided for in the original bill are, for the reasons already given, not embraced in the substitute, nor is any provision made to authorize the Southern Pacific of California to build the west half of the road.

The second section, relating to pro rata arrangements with connecting roads and like questions, is almost identical with the same section in the original bill, and affords I think all the safeguards required to secure the end aimed at.

The third section provides that the company shall execute and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury bonds of the company, properly secured by mortgage on the road, lands, and franchises of the company, to the amount of $30,000 per mile of road to be constructed, said bonds to be payable in lawful money fifty years after date and to bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent. a year; interest not to begin to run until three years after date.

The fourth section provides that on the construction of ten or more miles of road and their acceptance by the Government on the certificate of commissioners given under oath, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to said company non-interest-bearing Treasury notes of the United States to the amount of the actual cost of the road, not to exceed the average rate of $30,000 per mile.

The proposition embodied in the two last sections is simply this, that, instead of the Government lending the company its credit in the shape of a guarantee of the interest on the bonds of the company to the amount of $175,000,000, it shall lend its credit in the form of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to the amount of about $42,000,000. This proposition, simple and plain as it is, will lead to results as different from those which would follow the passage of the original bill as day is from night.

If the bonds of the company are guaranteed as to their interest by the Government the company could not use them directly in the construction of the road, but would have to go shinning around the markets of the world at a great expense and stand a heavy discount, in all probability, to obtain capital, representing past labor, to use as a tool of exchange in order to avail itself of the labor and resources of our own people in the construction of its road. This is not only entirely unnecessary—for, as already suggested, it is not past labor that is wanted, but simply a tool of exchange to render available present labor and resources on hand—but it is worse. It entails upon the people a burden equal to the interest paid for foreign capital used in the construction of the road, and in case the company becomes delinquent and the road passes into the hands of its foreign mortgagees it will prove a drain upon the country to the extent of the profits of the road forever unless the road is repurchased by our own people at some future time, which can never happen if money continues to be instituted as at present.

The interest on $70,000,000 at 5 per cent. a year would be $3,500,000, the amount which would have to be sent abroad each year in products or bullion to pay for the use of capital needed to serve the purposes of money. If the experience of the Union Pacific is to be taken as a criterion, this amount is larger than the Texas and Pacific Company can hope to realize from the profits of its road for many years to come, and would lead to embarrassment to the company, high rates of transportation, and to further taxation on the part of the Government; and in the end, as already suggested, would render the road tributary solely to foreign capitalists. We have now too many roads built in this manner, working solely for the advantage of foreigners, and it is time for us to look a little more closely to the interests of our own people. The cry of reform was heard throughout the land last fall, and was indorsed by the people in the most overwhelming manner, as indicated by the election of Mr. Tilden. If reformation is needed in anything more than another—more even than turning out the thieves and plunderers of the people now in office—it is in the present financial policy of the Government, which for years past has been skillfully molded to enrich the capitalist, the money-lender, and the bondholder at the expense of the industrial and business classes of the country.

Let us now contrast this with the results to which the principles embodied in the substitute will lead. The company in the first place would be furnished with precisely what is needed, a tool of exchange, ready money, without incurring any ruinous expense to obtain it, to prosecute its work and construct the road. Interest does not begin to run on the credit of the Government, lent in this form to the company for three years, giving ample time, with the advantage of ready money, to complete the road and begin to earn the money required to meet it. The interest which the company will be called upon to pay to the Government is fixed at the low rate of 2 per cent. in order to enable the company to construct its road cheaply, and as a consequence to carry cheaply. This fact of itself involves results of the most important character, such as inviting immigration along the line of road and securing the rapid development of the region traversed by it; and also insuring cheap transportation to the Pacific Ocean by a competing line to the route already established. The low rate of interest will place it within the power of the company to meet its obligations as they fall due; for if it can hope to pay 5 per cent. to foreign capitalists it can certainly pay 2 to the United States Government, so that no embarrassment to the company or high rates of transportation need be apprehended, and instead of proving a drain upon the country, tending to enrich foreigners, it will prove a source of revenue to the Government, and relieve to that extent the burden of taxation. If the Federal Government is to lend its credit to a corporation for the purpose of constructing a work of this kind, to be owned by the corporation and operated solely for its private gains, it is but fair and proper that, until this credit, in the form of notes, is repaid, a portion of the earnings of the road should be applied to the payment of interest to the Government. It certainly is better all round, for both the Government and the people, as well as the company, that it should pay 2 per cent. interest to the Government than 5 per cent. abroad.

In order to meet the interest on its bonds and for the purpose of providing for their gradual redemption the company is required to pay into the Treasury of the United States every six months: first, the net earnings of the road; second, the net proceeds of the sale of lands; and, third, the amount due from the Government for transportation, and mail, and telegraphic service, and ample provision is made by the substitute to protect the Government against fraud in these particulars. The whole amount of the revenues of the road is required to be turned over to the Government in order that it may be secured to the utmost extent for the loan of its credit until the whole is repaid. It will not be possible under these provisions for anybody to misapply, under any circumstances, the funds of the road. That the Government is justified in exacting these conditions, I think cannot be disputed, when the object to be attained, as well as the responsibility of the Government, is fully considered.

As the company cannot control one dollar of the revenues of the road, over and above operating expenses, until the entire debt is paid, it would naturally desire to pay it off as rapidly as possible in order to acquire absolute control of the road at the earliest day possible. To accomplish this end, the highest obtainable rates for freight and travel would be imposed, depriving the people of cheap transportation and defeating one of the main objects of the construction of the road; and it is therefore provided by the substitute that the bonds of the company held by the Government shall not be redeemed at a more rapid rate than $2,000,000 a year. This, in connection with the right reserved by Congress to regulate rates of travel and freight, will enable this body, when advised from time to time of the revenues of the company, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to see that the rates are uniformly kept on a plane corresponding with its revenues.

The matter may therefore be summed up as follows: The Government is to lend its credit to the Texas and Pacific Company to the amount of $42,000,000, at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, in the form of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, calculated to circulate as money, the interest not to begin to run for three years, after which it is to be paid semi-annually at the rate 2 per cent. a year, and the bonds are to be redeemed at the rate of $2,000,000 a year.

Assuming that the company will have no difficulty in complying with these terms the result will be seen by a glance at the following table, three years being allowed for the completion of the road.

Twenty-first installment of bonds, payable June 1, 1901		2,000,000

By the foregoing table it will be seen that the whole amount of the credit lent by the Government will be repaid in twenty-one years, and that the Government will also receive during this period the sum of $9,240,000 as interest.

Thus, besides the other advantages conferred upon the nation by the construction of the road, it will prove a source of revenue instead of expense, until after the bonds of the company are wholly retired. But suppose the company is not able to redeem any of its bonds for the first twenty or thirty years, in that event not only will no harm result to the Government or the people, but on the contrary the Government will continue to be in the receipt of a much larger revenue from the road during the whole time in the way of interest, and I may still go further, and say that even in case the company is unable to pay either principal or interest for years to come, its failure to do so would not redound to the injury of either Government or people in the slightest degree. Contrast this with the plan proposed by the original bill, which under the most favorable circumstances will cause to be sent abroad in the payment of principal and interest products or bullion to the amount of $245,000,000, or, in case the road should fail to meet its obligation, would render the Government liable for $175,000,000, to be raised by taxation, and in all probability give the road into the hands of foreigners to be managed in their own interests for all time to come; or again, contrast it with the plan upon which the Union Pacific was built; which has rendered that road a burden to the nation, to the amount of nearly $4,000,000 a year.

Besides the many advantages which the nation would enjoy, arising from the construction of the road by the plan proposed, the issue and circulation of $42,000,000 of par paper money, not peddled out by the banks at a high rate of interest, to be recalled at pleasure, would contribute largely to the revival of our prostrate industries; no small matter of itself. As this money could not be retired by the Federal Treasury any faster than the bonds of the company are redeemed, any delinquency on the part of the company in that respect would be more than counterbalanced by the good results that would continue to flow from the use of that amount of cheap money in the hands of the people.

The cry of inflation will doubtless be raised by the bondholders and gold gamblers and their tools and organs throughout the country, and it may not therefore be out of place to say a word upon that point. The Government has succeeded, by contraction and so legislating as to render further contraction inevitable in the interests of the classes referred to, in paralyzing the productive industries of the country to an alarming extent. Indeed, if matters go on in the present way much longer it will soon be impossible for the industrial and business classes to pay their taxes, much less their current obligations. When it is proposed by this House to undo the rascality which was perpetrated in 1873 and re-establish the silver dollar of the country a great hue and cry is raised by the money power that injustice will be done to the creditor, meaning more particularly the bondholders, and much is said about maintaining the credit of the Government. Why, the credit of the Government as represented by our bonds is 5 per cent. or more above par in gold to-day; but where is the voice of any one heard denouncing the rascally policy that is reducing the value of property of all kinds from 20 to 50 per cent., that is driving the business classes of the country into bankruptcy and is spreading poverty and distress broadcast throughout the land?

We possess a land rich in natural resources, far more so perhaps than that possessed by any other nation under the sun; we are in the habit of boasting of our intelligence, our skill, and our enterprise, and yet to-day poverty and want are stalking through the land, and as a people we are the poorest of any among civilized nations. Is there not a reason for this? Would-be statesmen and political economists who eat their bread in the fear of the money power say that it is due to overproduction, extravagance on the part of the people, and like causes. This is more than nonsense, and will deceive none but the ignorant. Human ingenuity is being constantly taxed to invent new methods by which production can be increased and cheapened in order that the good things of this world may be brought within the reach of all, and such a thing as overproduction, as society is now constituted, is an absurdity. The charge of extravagance is equally groundless. The industrial and producing classes of society labor year in and year out, scarcely enjoying the common comforts of life, and are only too glad under the present system if they can accumulate a little property after years of toil. No, Mr. Speaker, the only extravagance that has manifested itself to any great extent in American society is among those who are enabled to rob the people while occupying positions of public trust or by means of the present false and corrupt financial policy.

The simple truth, divested of all the fallacies by which it has been surrounded by interested parties in these Halls, in the press, and in colleges, is this: The powers of production of late years have been increased enormously, but no corresponding advancement or progress has taken place in the machinery of distribution, in which money, the tool of exchange, plays the most important part. On the contrary, every effort has been made by the money power not only to repress any advancement in that direction, but to still further increase the power of money over labor and property by further diminishing its amount, as compared with population and trade. This is witnessed in the Old World by the attempt to demonetize silver, and in this country by the demonetization of silver and the effort to retire the Treasury notes of the Federal Government.

In European countries, except perhaps in France where an enlightened system of money exists, the money power has had absolute sway, and by limiting the legal-tender money to an insignificant amount as compared with the growth of population, commerce, and trade, it has been enabled to reap the entire profits of industry for generations, until now we see it as a result that the wealth of the world is being rapidly concentrated in the hands of the few and the masses are consigned to drudgery and poverty. Do American statesmen desire to produce similar results in this country? The legislation of Congress during the past ten years looks very much as if they did.

A nation cannot have any more wealth than it produces. It is therefore of the first importance to give free development to all of its producing forces: its soil, its mines, its water-power, its machinery, its labor, &c. This can only be done, as is fully demonstrated by experience, through the instrumentality of an abundant and cheap currency. As well talk about farming without implements, or transportation without cars or wagons as to talk about producing wealth in a civilized nation without a currency sufficiently cheap and abundant to circulate naturally in the channels of trade, in obedience to the laws of supply and demand. It will be said, however, that we have sufficient currency in the banks and that it can easily be got out if people have anything to get it with. This is another of the plausible fallacies used to hoodwink the public in regard to the source of our present financial troubles. Why is money plenty in the banks? This fact alone, that the money and currency of the country are all concentrated in the banks and in the money centers, I submit, is conclusive proof that there is something inherently wrong with our system of money. Why is it not filling the channels of trade and performing the functions for which money or currency is designed? Because, Mr. Speaker, industry has been robbed of its profits and driven to the wall, helpless, by means of contraction and the tribute exacted by the banks, as middlemen, in supplying our currency, which should be supplied by the Government, free of tribute, in the legitimate conduct of its affairs.

No revival of business or production can possibly be looked for as long as the money-lenders and bondholders are permitted to furnish us with a theory of money and a financial policy calculated to advance their own interests alone, nor can we ever hope to extinguish the vast load of debt, national, State, corporate, and individual, which now burdens this people. And in this connection I wish to call attention to a fact connected with the national banks which I think is not fully considered or appreciated by the public at large. The basis of the currency of the national-banking system is the public debt or the bonds which represent it. Is it not perfectly clear that it is to the interest of the national banks to perpetuate the national debt in order that it may serve forever as such basis, and that every obstacle will be thrown by them in the way to prevent its extinction. This is one reason why silver has been demonetized and the bonds made payable only in gold. Good care will be taken that the Government shall never be able to get the gold, and in this way it is expected, not only that our national debt shall never be extinguished, but, on the other hand, that it will be increased. The late message of President Grant, recommending the funding of $150,000,000 of greenbacks in interest-bearing gold bonds, is a step in this direction that has been contemplated all along, and will be pressed until accomplished unless the people are aroused to a sense of their danger. It was not expected that the recommendations contained in the message referred to would be carried out at this session of Congress, but its object is to familiarize the people with the proposition by having it favorably commented upon and indorsed by the organs of the money power throughout the country. This question in relation to banks—I allude to the power with which they are clothed by law to issue their own notes to circulate as a currency—is one of paramount importance at the present time, for during the next four or five years they intend by retiring the circulation of the Government to obtain sole control of the currency of the country, and fasten upon us a system of money the effect of which will be, here as in Europe, to concentrate the wealth of the people in the hands of the few and reduce the masses to the ignoble position of "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for them.

I may add further, in regard to the charge of inflation which will be raised against this substitute, that the whole amount of Treasury notes proposed to be issued under its provisions, about $42,000,000, will not equal the amount of bank currency retired from circulation during the past year. Besides, these Treasury notes would not all be issued at once, but gradually, as the road is constructed, and it is more than probable that a much larger amount could be absorbed by the increased business consequent upon the development of the new region of country through which it would extend.

The design of this substitute, it will be observed, is twofold: to secure the construction of another and a competing road to the Pacific Ocean, opening up and developing, at the same time, a vast region abounding in natural wealth, and to give to the nation the nucleus of a sound currency.

At this period of civilization it is manifest that a paper money in some form is absolutely necessary, and as bank currency has been demonstrated by experience to be the worst form of paper money ever devised, some other system of money should be established. With the fathers of the Republic I am in favor of gold, silver, and the Treasury note, and as much ado continues to be made about the legal-tender character of the greenback, I have adopted that form of Treasury note which has received the sanction of all branches of the Government and of the people since the early part of the present century. A great deal has been said about tinkering with the currency, and we are told by tools of the money power and by the economists that if we let matters alone they will regulate themselves. I agree with them fully so far as the principle is concerned, but perhaps I would make a somewhat different application of it. I, too, Mr. Speaker, am opposed to tinkering with the currency. There has been entirely too much of it done. Scarcely a session of Congress has passed since the war closed that has not witnessed the passage of some law relating to our financial policy in the interests of the bondholder and the money-lender, and against the property-owner, the manufacturer, the business man, the farmer, and the laborer. Instead of those who demanded an honest currency issued by the Government being the "tinkers," it is the other fellows. They have had their hands on the throat of industry and in the pockets of the people long enough and they must be made to let go their hold, in order that industry may have an opportunity to revive and lend its aid in restoring prosperity to the nation.

It will perhaps be urged against the Treasury note in the form provided for by the eleventh section of the substitute that it will not circulate at par and will constitute a depreciated currency. There never has been an instance of a Treasury note issued in the proper form and made receivable for all taxes, dues, and demands, including customs, that depreciated a farthing. Even during the darkest period of the war the Treasury notes issued in this form, known as the "old demand notes," circulated at par with gold and went up with it to a premium, as compared with greenbacks, of 2.85½, and for no other reason than that it was receivable by the Government the same as gold coin. That it will not do so now when no uncertainty will attend its use, and the revenues of the Government exceed $250,000,000 a year, is a gratuitous assumption based on neither reason nor experience. It is far more likely that they will not only be equal to gold but preferable on account of their greater convenience.

With such a currency filling the channels of circulation, the producing forces of the nation would find free development, and our productions would increase with such rapidity and to such an extent that our national debt would prove but a mere bagatelle. During the period immediately succeeding the war, before McCulloch began his infamous policy, our production of wealth was so great, owing to the abundance of paper money in circulation, that we paid off about $500,000,000 of our public debt without experiencing the least distress on account of taxation. A sounder currency, such as this will prove, will enable us to produce wealth more rapidly than we did then, and render it possible for us to pay off our foreign liabilities and by our excess of productions obtain all the gold and silver required for specie circulation, in case it is desired, in a very short time. It is impossible in a speech of this character to notice all the fallacies put forward by the advocates of the bank-currency system of money, but I will dispose of one more. It is said that such a currency as I propose will drive gold out of the country. If we reach a healthy balance of trade in our favor by reason of producing an excess of products instead of an unhealthy one, such as exists at the present time by reason of our poverty, what, I would like to know, could take gold out of the country? Bullion goes abroad to settle balances, but if the balances are in our favor, what, I repeat, could take gold abroad? Would it not rather flow in this direction if we preferred to have it instead of commodities?

But I have given more consideration to this branch of the subject than I had designed, and I will conclude with a brief review of the leading features of the substitute, which I will here remark has been offered not in the interest of any corporation, as may be judged by the stringency of its provisions, but in the sincere hope that this House may be induced to aid this work as a work of national importance, especially at the present time, in a way that will result in utilizing our own resources and enable us when the work is completed to retain all the benefits that may flow from it within our own borders and in the hands of own people.

In conclusion, then, I think I have shown—

First. That we have an undoubted right to aid a work of national importance of this character, where it extends through a new region of which the Government is part proprietor.

Secondly. That the Government having no right to enter upon a general system of internal improvement, should not aid the branches proposed in the original bill.

Thirdly. That it is not to the interests of the Government or people to permit the Southern Pacific of California, which is identical with the Central Pacific that owns and controls the west half of the Union Pacific, to build the west half of the Texas and Pacific.

Fourthly. That the policy of issuing bonds, whether Government or railroad, with a view to their sale abroad to obtain capital, is not only an unnecessary but a vicious method of obtaining money, resulting in a drain upon the industries of the country, and should no longer be resorted to by the Federal Government, directly or indirectly.

Fifthly. That the nation possesses abundance of capital in its natural resources and labor, which latter is lost forever if not employed, that can be rendered available for all purposes, greatly to the advantage of the Government and nation, if touched by the vitalizing influence of money.

Sixthly. That the Treasury note of the United States constitutes the cheapest and most convenient tool of exchange, money, that can be devised for the purpose of developing the producing forces of the nation.

Seventhly. That the plan proposed will not only secure the construction of the road in the most economical and speedy manner possible, and also cheap transportation, but will enable us to retain all the profits which will arise from the development of the country and the operation of the road in the hands of our own people.

Eighthly. That instead of the road being a burden upon the Government or people, it will be a source of revenue to one and of wealth to the other.

Ninthly. That under the provisions of the substitute, all revenues of the company being paid directly to the Government, it will be impossible for the company to evade its obligations.

Tenthly. That the business interests of this country will be greatly benefited, not only directly by the construction of the road, but indirectly by the use of a considerable amount of par paper money, now so greatly needed in the channels of trade.

If these and other objects of a like nature can be secured by the passage of this substitute, I submit that it would not only be wise in this House to aid in the construction of this road, but that, considering the prostrate condition of our industries, it is also a duty.

South Carolina.

SPEECH OF HON. E. G. LAPHAM,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1877,

On the reports of the select committee to investigate the recent election in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHILIPS] in relation to the investigation made by the select committee to South Carolina, as well as the reports submitted by the members of that committee, seem to require of me, as one of the minority of said committee, a brief notice of some of the extraordinary statements and deductions in said speech and reports. The gentleman from Missouri opens his speech by saying that, "to comprehend a political contest and its results in South Carolina, one must go and look at it." Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been and "looked at it," as well as the gentleman, and I think he entirely fails to comprehend it [the contest] or "its results." I make no hazard in saying if he had "looked at it" from a different stand-point, and as an impartial searcher for the truth, his inferences would have received less coloring from that open contempt for the condition of the emancipated race of the South and their equal rights before the law which breathes from almost every sentence in his speech and every line in his report.

A speech with such an animus most naturally commences with degrading comparisons of the condition of the colored men and Federal officers in the State, drawn copiously from the words of "Jack Falstaff," of whom Johnson has written that he was a "compound of sense and vice; of sense which may be admired but not esteemed; of vice which may be despised, but hardly detested; a character loaded with faults and with those faults which naturally produce contempt; a thief and a glutton, a coward and a boaster, always ready to cheat the weak and prey upon the poor; to terrify the timorous and insult the defenseless."

Let me briefly recur to the picture drawn by the gentleman from Missouri. "There was no sun in the heavens," and "two of his associates and himself decided to go in advance of the rest of the committee, unheralded and unknown." At the threshold a familiar sight caught his eye. He had "looked at it" before in Missouri. Within, however, was a strange scene. "Negro men and women, peanut-stands and gingerbread, peanut-shells, gingerbread crumbs, with cigar-stumps and negro babies, in profusion over the floor, which no broom or wet nurse had interrupted for a fortnight," and all because the gentleman from Missouri and his two associates went "unheralded and unknown." If the darkies had only "known it" what a different spectacle would have been presented to the view of the gentleman and his associates. The Hampton rifle clubs, who assembled by thousands in Columbia on Monday before the arrival of the committee, "knew all about it," and before we reached the capitol had set their house in order under the advice of their leaders, who said—I quote from the evidence in the case:

Q. Were you in Columbia at the time the congressional committee arrived there?
A. I was.
Q. How long before?
A. I arrived there on the morning that the Legislature met, on the 28th.
Q. How many days had you been there?
A. Ten days. I think it was ten days.
Q. You were there, then, during the whole of the same week?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear the address of General Hampton to the assemblage on Tuesday evening?
A. I did.
Q. To the clubs who were there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what he said.
A. He said, "Gentlemen, I do not know what you are here for; you have come to attend the fair; but, if so, you come one day too soon." And he advised them to keep quiet.
Q. That was the only allusion he made to the fair?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. On the next evening, Wednesday evening, did you hear the address made by Moise?
A. This address of Hampton was made on Tuesday, the 29th, I think; I am not certain of the date; but the evening before the committee arrived in Columbia, Mr. Moise addressed them a short time.
Q. Where was that?
A. It was just below the Wheeler House, on the same street.
Q. A public address in the street?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. If he said anything on that subject, state what he said.
A. He said, "Gentlemen, I want you all to go home. The congressional committee are coming here to-morrow, and we want to see no demonstrations of such crowds"—or language to that effect—"while they are here."

Prominent among those who remained to greet the committee were the Senator from Georgia, (GORDON, whose State loaned a large quantity of voters to South Carolina in the late contest,) General M. C. Butler, of Hamburgh, and his henchman, General Geary, who in the hearing of the committee advised the riflemen of South Carolina when they commenced firing to "shoot from Governor Chamberlain down." These, "arrayed in purple and fine linen," were among the first to welcome us.

From this scene let me turn to follow the picture of the gentleman from Missouri. He and his associates "essayed," but in vain, to get a sight at the inner temple—the Legislature. All efforts were fruitless, and the gentleman and his associates were about giving up in despair, when it "leaked out" they were from Washington and might perhaps call on the Federal Army, and then the doors were opened. Such a pursuit of knowledge under difficulties as that made by the gentleman and his associates, "unheralded and unknown," has never been prosecuted before, and such a scene as that "renowned Legislature" presented to the astonished gaze of the member from Missouri and his associates was never before witnessed.

It was essentially negro, but one white man in it; sergeant-at-arms, a negro; doorkeeper, a negro; pages, negroes; lobby, negroes.

Think of a negro lobby in South Carolina.

Among its members men of unquestioned ability, with a creditable aptness in parliamentary usage, but the mass indicating that the statesmen of South Carolina are indigenous to the cotton-patch and rice-field.

There's the rub. The "field hands" of South Carolina taking part in the politics of the State!

Mr. Speaker, I am very far removed from a feeling of gratification at the condition of affairs at Columbia when the committee reached there, or that we found in the State generally so far as our investigations extended. The State of South Carolina is not now suffering alone from the effects of bad government since the close of the war, but from a hundred years of bad government, the fruits of which are seen in every phase of life, which affect the political and social conditions alike, and which rest like an incubus upon all the energies of the State.

The administration of Governor Chamberlain has done much to relieve the people from the burdens of taxation and was generally accepted by all parties, especially the democrats, to a period as late as the middle of August last. It was then determined to recall General Hampton from Mississippi, where he had become a resident, and by adopting a policy of threats and force and murder, to overawe the colored electors of the State and secure the success of a State ticket composed of native white South Carolinians. The Hamburgh massacre on the 4th of July and the Ellenton riots at a later period were inspired by this motive. An armed force of rifle clubs, composed of a large portion of the white population of the State, was organized and placed under the command of General Hampton. They were armed with breech-loading rifles, seven-shooters, and had also their belts and revolvers. They were formed into cavalry companies in large numbers. They appeared thus armed and mounted at the republican meetings in nearly every part of the State in the early part of the canvass, and either enforced their demand for a division of time or were successful in breaking up the meetings and preventing their success. To call such meetings joint discussions would be a mockery. Every vile epithet which could be invented was heaped upon the heads of republicans and no opportunity or liberty to reply was allowed. The negroes and few white republicans at such meetings were unarmed, and of course compelled to submit to such indignities. They were powerless to overcome force so well and efficiently organized, and to have attempted resistance would have precipitated conflict and deluged the State with blood. The governor, in such an emergency, called in the aid of the General Government and by proclamation commanded the rifle clubs to disperse. As the rifles disappeared, revolvers multiplied and in many instances, as the evidence shows, white persons were at the meetings with two and sometimes three revolvers in their belts, and some had them in their boot-legs. Except in the South Carolinian idea of the sanctity of the weapon they were unlike the pistol described in an epitaph from California which I recently chanced to see in a volume of church-yard literature, and which read:

In memory ov
John Smith, who met
Wierlent death near this spot
18 hundred and 40 too. He was shot by his own pistell;
It was not one of the new kind;
but a old-fashioned brass barrel, and of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

The Hampton riflemen were well supplied with the "new kind." Of course a canvass thus inaugurated by such demonstrations of violence and force could not well be entirely divested of the element even to its close. The colored voters learned to imitate the example. In localities where they were strong in numbers they were more outspoken in such demonstrations and were successful in securing nearly the full vote at the polls. In other portions of the State the terror created was so great that large numbers of colored electors were prevented from voting, and the full republican vote of the State was not cast. On the other hand, the democratic vote was very largely increased. In several counties it is in excess of the voting population, as shown by the census of 1875, which was denounced at the time as an extravagant enumeration. At a precinct called "Robbins," in Barnwell County, the building was fired at about eleven a. m. The officers fled. The ballot-box was lost or destroyed. In the afternoon the republican managers opened the poll at an old school-house in the vicinity and 1,317 votes were cast for the entire republican ticket. This vote has never been counted in any canvass. I learn that the referee appointed by the supreme court of the State to recanvass and ascertain the votes at the late election has decided that the vote of Robbins should be counted. This will give a clear majority to all republican State officers and in the Legislature, including all the other votes cast in the State. I have no doubt but the republican majority in the State upon a free and fair vote at the late election would have exceeded 10,000, nor have I any doubt but there was a majority in their favor of the votes actually cast. Whether Governor Chamberlain will be able to maintain his authority without aid from without is the problem yet to be solved. To overthrow him would be to subvert and overthrow the lawfully elected and constituted government of the State in obedience to a clamor coming from the white natives of the State against "northern thieves and carpet-baggers," as every one is termed who will not pay tribute to the aspirations of the whites to obtain control of the political affairs of the State.

In his duplicate letter to Governor Tilden and Governor Hayes, soon after the election, General Hampton expressed a purpose to so conduct affairs as to open the State to "northern enterprise and capital and social equality." These are her greatest needs. The political and social ostracism existing will shut out all these aids to her success. It was never more manifest than during the recent canvass. I might detain the House for an hour by an enumeration of the instances and details coming to my knowledge during the investigations of the committee; they will be found stated in the evidence and referred to in the reports. Every branch of trade, every department of labor, and every business enterprise was subject to their malign influence. Here is a sample of the humiliation to which humble dealers were subjected, taken from the Charleston News and Courier, in which it was standing matter during the canvass:

Mr. Speaker, if the State of South Carolina could be thrown open to freedom of enterprise and the employment of capital in the development of her resources, her prosperity would begin to date from such an era. They are advantages which have been hitherto denied her. The great men about whom we hear and read so much, who controlled her destinies for a century, built splendidly for themselves and their class, but the prosperity of which they boasted was a superstructure erected upon the unrequited toil and sweat of the colored race. The recipients were reared in idleness and bred to a contempt for labor. They built upon the sand. The fruits of such a system are visible all over the State. The city of Columbia furnishes an example. Situated in the heart of the best cotton-growing region in the world—at an elevation of about seven hundred feet above the sea—for seventy-five years the capital of the State, with a salubrious climate and no winter with which to contend, yet there is a want of thrift visible everywhere, and the waters of her magnificent river go unvexed to the sea, without moving a wheel or turning a spindle. If the enterprise and skill which, contending with many obstacles not there found, have yet coined wealth out of the manufacture of her raw material and returned in part the fabrics for her use could be employed without obstacle or hinderance within the State, then, indeed, peace would be surely found in her palaces and prosperity in her borders.

In that work of regeneration and restoration the colored population of the State are to perform no unimportant part. In their ranks are to be found many men of talent and education, graduates of her university and of the other institutions of learning devoted to the object of their education. They were active and fearless in the late contest in upholding the right and animating those of their own race to a fearless and faithful discharge of duty, verifying the prophecy of their great emancipator in his address to Governor Hahn, of Louisiana, that—

The ballot in the hand of the black man may help in some trying time to come to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom.

Political and Financial Condition of the Country.

SPEECH OF HON. A. CAMPBELL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1877,

On the political and financial situation, as viewed from the independent stand-point.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, with the next regular adjournment this the most important session of Congress that has been hold since the organization of the Government will expire. It will be memorable in history as commencing in the close of the first and ending in the beginning of the second century of our national existence; it will also be memorable on account of the momentous questions which it was called to act upon and determine; but it will be far more memorable as marking a new era in the administration of the Government. The present is not the time to determine whether its acts have in all respects been the wisest and best that could have been done under the circumstances. To judge correctly in this respect we must wait until the passions of men have cooled and the excitement of the contest has passed away.

Both parties have charged their opponents with the commission and attempts to commit fraud. That some of these charges are true there is no room for doubt. I firmly believe that when the excitement of the contest will have passed away the verdict of candid men of all parties will be that the election in the State of Louisiana was from beginning to end a farce; that it was so saturated with fraud that to have included it in the count for either candidate was to offer a premium for villainy and perjury, and that the attempt to commit an equally heinous crime in the case of the electoral vote of Oregon has been equally clearly established.

But, Mr. Speaker, these frauds on the part of returning boards and attempted frauds by other parties and by other means are but the legitimate result of a deliberate purpose on the part of the prime leaders of both parties to deceive and mislead the people in reference to the financial policy of the Government, which was the paramount issue involved in the contest. The bankers, usurers, and their retainers, who controlled both nominating conventions, cared but little what the views of the successful candidate were on all other subjects if only he favored the withdrawal of the legal-tenders and the surrender of the control of the currency to the national banks. They were successful in the selection of candidates for both parties known to be in favor of their financial policy. One was the result of accident and the other was forced on the convention against the wishes of a large majority of the voters of the party. They were also successful in securing the adoption of platforms for both parties susceptible of different constructions, and newspapers, orators, and candidates were not wanting to interpret them to meet the views of the voters in the different sections. Thus every step in the progress of the campaign, from the nominating conventions to the end of the labors of the returning boards, has been marked by treachery and fraud. And I will add that the end is but a fitting culmination of the financial policy of the Government for the past sixteen years.

In proof of this charge it is only necessary to glance at the history of the legislation on this subject for the time stated. At the commencement of the late domestic war the bankers and other so-called capitalists of New York and other money centers flocked to the national capital ostensibly for the purpose of aiding the Government in providing the means to prosecute the war, but in reality, with few exceptions, as the sequel will show, to see how they could best increase their private gains by the national calamity. But when all their plans were examined it was found that they had neither the ability nor the disposition to meet the demands on the Treasury for ninety days, and that the terms they proposed were most extortionate and humiliating to the Government. The only means left for meeting the demands on the Government was the issue of Treasury notes, against which these self-styled patriots protested and to this day have continued to protest, and have resorted to every device their ingenuity could invent to induce the people to discredit them, but without avail. No soldier, miner, mechanic, or farmer has ever refused to accept them nor petitioned Congress to withdraw them from circulation. The opposition to the use of these notes as a circulating medium comes solely from the bankers, usurers, and boards of trade, and others of their retainers.

When, in February, 1862, it became necessary to rely wholly upon the confidence of those who produced the supplies the Government needed, the House passed a bill authorizing a large additional issue of Treasury notes, making them a legal tender for all debts, public and private. The bankers and usurers at once besieged Senators and by intimidation or other potential influences prevailed upon that body to insist upon excepting payment of customs duties and interest on the public debt. Although this single act has cost the tax-payers hundreds of millions of dollars it failed to destroy the confidence of the people in this currency. But for this act legal-tenders would long ere this have been par with coin and furnished the people with the most safe, uniform, and convenient circulating medium we have ever had or ever can have under the operation of bankers' specie-basis fallacy. The next movement on the part of the bankers and their allies was the bill creating the national-banking system, which became a law in July, 1863. But little currency was issued under it before July, 1864, when it was revised and re-enacted substantially in its present form.

By this time it was quite manifest that the war would be of short duration and there was a demand from all sections of the country for permission to engage in banking under the law and the $300,000,000 of circulation then authorized was soon taken up. The New England and other Eastern States having acquired more than their portion of the circulation and refusing to surrender it, an increase in the volume of the currency to the extent of $54,000,000 was authorized and finally by the law, 14th January, 1875, all acts limiting the aggregate amount of the circulation of the banks were repealed, and the Secretary of the Treasury was required to retire legal-tenders to the extent of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes issued thereafter until the amount of legal-tenders outstanding should be reduced to $300,000,000. But another provision of that law authorizes the retirement of all the legal-tenders after the 1st of January, 1879, by converting them into interest-bearing bonds. Thus they have succeeded in crucifying the legal-tenders or people's money, that proved the salvation of the Government without imposing or entailing any burdens on the tax-payers, and in releasing the blackbacks with full power to rob the people without check or restraint. This was the object the bankers and their allies had in view from the inception of their scheme. But they approached it stealthily, step by step, because they feared the people. The cunning ones among them said "Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people." Now, it is just possible that the sovereign people may yet take it into their heads to resurrect these despised and persecuted legal-tenders and to crucify the banker's blackbacks, even if they should have to do it through uproar.

The bankers are now demanding the repeal of the tax on deposits; a tax they pay in common with all private bankers. If this demand is met they will demand a repeal of the tax on circulation as well as the pittance they pay on capital over the amount invested in Government bonds. These are all the taxes they pay to the National Government, and the repeal of which would leave them subject to State tax only. The only remaining demand to constitute these corporations the Government de facto will be to be made the agents for receiving and disbursing all public moneys. This will exempt them from State taxes and clothe them with absolute power over the finances of the Government and people. The bankers and their retainers, members of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, &c., have been here in unusually large force this session and besieged the Committee of Ways and Means and other members with their sophistical arguments for the abatement of taxes. They only asked at this time to be relieved from the tax on deposits, but intimated very clearly that they would at a future time ask for the repeal of the duty on circulation and all other taxes imposed by the National Government. It is worthy of note that the bankers never ask for anything for their special benefit; all their pleas are made in behalf of commerce or workingmen, and of the widows and orphans who are so unfortunate as to be stockholders in institutions that only earn from 11 to 13 per cent. per annum.

Mr. George S. Coe, president of the American Exchange National Bank, New York, in his address before the Committee of Ways and Means said: "I stand before you, gentlemen, in a double relation; representing on the one hand a national bank, on the other hand the chamber of commerce. But I think you will say, as I proceed, that in respect to the question before the committee these interests are identical. The subject before you is a subject not of banks but of commerce, and in that view I wish to speak." From this it will be seen that nothing is asked for the banks; the plea is wholly in behalf of commerce. But further on in his argument the same gentleman said:

> Now, as to dividends. The banks in the city of New York, one-half of them, have not for the last two years earned their dividends, and for the last year not one-third of them. And I say furthermore, that there is not one-third of all of those that have not drawn upon the reserves which they accumulated during the war. They have paid the dividends out of those reserves to the stockholders, if they have paid any. Why have they done so? Because their stockholders consist largely of women and dependent persons. The average amount owned by each stockholder is $2,000. The stockholders of these banks are not a body of capitalists, bloated bondholders, or any other odious term. They are mostly people in moderate circumstances, who have savings in the bank to the average amount of $2,000. And these people cannot live in this exhausted state of things unless they get something out of their stock. They appeal to us with agony and with tears, "Give us a dividend, draw it from your reserves; the reserves were made for dividends." And so we by necessity respond, "We must do it." And we have done it. I say that our institutions did not earn the dividends which they have declared, but they paid them out of their reserves, because they could not help responding to the agonies of the stockholders and to the necessities of the case. I tell you that on every hand the fabric is falling into decay. The whole thing is going to destruction. And upon your decision depends the question whether that destruction shall go on or whether it shall be staid. The structure of government under which we live is no more important to the people than the institutions which we represent here. You are well aware of their age, their importance, and their stability. When all kinds of corporations are failing around us from demoralization and wrong-doing, how few, how very few, how small a percentage of those banking institutions are giving way for that reason. It is an exception worthy of being recorded. But it is impossible for them to continue. They will fall, and, like lamps without oil, they will burn out and expire.

Here it will be seen that nothing is said about commerce. The argument is that stockholders in national banks—which it would seem were mostly women—must have uniform and large dividends or everything, even the Government under which we live, must go to the "bad."

Now if the arguments of this banker and intelligent business man—and of such it is claimed all chambers of commerce and boards of trade are composed—are well founded, it surely was unreasonable and short-sighted policy on the part of the committee to refuse to save the Government, revive commerce, and make everything lovely on such easy terms. As the arguments of the other gentlemen who addressed the committee were of much the same character I will not quote further from them, but will proceed to show how the Government has oppressed and is oppressing these poor bankers and "intelligent business men," and generally all those who live and hrive by usury and monopoly.

The circulation of the national banks for eleven years from 1st of January, 1866, to 1st January, 1877, averaged $320,000,000, and the rate of interest on the bonds deposited to secure the redemption of the same averaged for the same time 5.75 in coin, and I think it safe to estimate the premium on coin for same period at 20 per cent. or 6.9 per cent. in currency. This would make the yearly interest paid to the banks by the Government $22,080,000, or $242,880,000 for the eleven years. During the same time the banks paid to the Government as tax or duty on circulation $33,928,703, leaving them a net profit of $208,951,297 in the eleven years. This is all the tax paid by the banks for the privilege of issuing the currency. All State and private banks pay the same tax on deposits and capital as the national banks. The tax paid by the national banks for same time on deposits was $33,609,892, or an average of $3,055,444 per annum. From this they now ask to be released. The whole amount of taxes paid into the National Treasury by the banks since their organization was as follows: On circulation, $33,928,703; on deposits, $33,609,892, and on capital, $4.714,547; total, $72,253,072; all of which was paid in currency. If this be deducted from $242,880,000, the amount paid to the banks by the Government as interest on the bonds deposited, it will leave as the net profit of the banks for the eleven years over and above all taxes $170,626,928, equal to $15,511,539 per annum.

But if this subsidy was the only evil of the system, even in an economical point of view, it might and doubtless would be borne without serious complaint. It is, however, but a mere moiety of the burdens imposed on the business interests of the nation by the bankers' scheme. The banking system, with the untaxed Government securities, constitute the main factors in the existing financial system under which the bankers and usurers can and do regulate the rate of interest on loanable capital so as to make every other interest tributary to them. These parties have a common interest and act together in all matters pertaining to the currency and the national finances; they have in the past and will in the future, so long as the system remains in force, continue to dictate the financial legislation of the nation.

By the provisions of the law authorizing the issue of that portion of the national debt known as five-twenties, the interest was payable in coin and the principal in lawful money, (greenbacks,) at the option of the Government, after five years from the date of their issue. Among the first acts of the outgoing administration was a law changing the payment of the principal of this portion of the debt from lawful money to coin, which was equivalent to a bonus or subsidy to the holder of this class of securities of over $300,000,000. Again, when these shrewd financiers saw that the product of silver from our mines was likely to be largely increased, they waited upon their agent, the Comptroller of the Currency, and directed him to recommend to Congress the demonetization of silver. In obedience thereto, Congress, in 1873, enacted that 25.8 grains of standard gold should be the unit of value and prohibited the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver, which had been the unit of value and a legal tender without limit from 1792 to the date of the passage of the act last named. The practical effect of this perfidious act will be not only to impose hundreds of millions of dollars additional burdens on the tax-payers, but to render it impossible to pay the public debt.

But it is claimed by these shrewd financiers and their retainers in and out of official position that all these subsidies and privileges are due to the so-called capitalists for their patriotic devotion to the Government during the late war, than which nothing can be further from the truth, for this impudent claim has no foundation in fact or equity. At the commencement of our late troubles, or just before the credit of the Government was affected thereby, the national securities bearing 6 per cent. were at a premium of 20 per cent. Now it will be admitted that if these self-styled patriotic capitalists had come forward and taken all the Government bonds bearing 6 per cent. at this rate they would have suffered no loss by the war and would have only performed their reasonable duty to the Government. But they were innocent of any such patriotic folly. They waited, indeed, the gold gamblers of Wall street made war on the credit of the Government, until they were enabled to purchase this class of bonds at an average of sixty cents on the dollar in coin. Now, a calculation on this basis will show that if these so-called capitalists had been content to have neither increased their gains nor suffered loss by the national calamity, the payments made to them as interest, with that portion of the principal that has been paid, would have discharged every dollar of the national debt prior to the 4th of July last. And had we but adopted a wise and just financial policy we should have entered upon the second century of our national existence a united, free, and prosperous people, and not as we have, a divided, discordant, and debt-burdened nation. To meet the last demand of the bankers and usurers it is only necessary to carry into effect that provision of law providing for resumption of specie payments 1st January, 1879, which provides for the redemption and cancellation of all legal-tenders then in circulation. This done, the bankers and their allies will have absolute control of the finances and currency of the nation, which is all that is needed to make them masters of the situation, with power to reduce the industrial classes to a state of practical slavery. To establish the existing money oligarchy for at least four years to come it only remains for the President-elect to place at the head of the Treasury Department a man committed to the policy of the bankers and usurers and to select for the remainder of his cabinet counselors, or at least a majority of them, men known to favor the policy of the money power at home and abroad.

I cannot better express my views as to the means and mode of operation by and through which this money power was first established and by which it is proposed to maintain and perpetuate it, than by inserting the following extract from a pamphlet written some twelve years ago, when I said:

I am persuaded that a thorough investigation and careful examination into the provisions of our monetary and revenue laws will convince any candid disinterested mind that the effect of their practical workings is and will be to give less than one-tenth of the population the power to rob the other nine-tenths of the product of their labor and talents; that under their operation the well-to-do farmers, miners, mechanics, and others of the industrial classes of to-day will soon be reduced to the status of common laborers, and those who now earn their living by daily toil to a state of positive servitude. Any system that authorizes and empowers one class to take from another class the fruits of their labor and talents without equivalent is practical slavery. I care not what it is called. When you deprive a man of the right to enjoy the fruits of his labor and talents, there is no other right which he can long maintain. The continual and pressing wants of his physical nature will soon induce mental degradation and reduce him to abject slavery; and what is true of the individual is true of the nation.

I assert without fear of successful contradiction that an investment of a million of dollars under the national banking law, or in the non-taxed Government securities, will yield a larger net income to its owner than a like amount invested in lands and slaves employed in raising cotton and sugar did in the South in the palmiest days of the oligarchy; and it was its economical or commercial value, in other words its profitableness, that maintained the institution of slavery in the South.

The late Horace Greeley, a life-long anti-slavery man, in his work entitled the American Conflict, after combating the system of chattel slavery, said:

But slavery, primarily considered, has still another aspect, that of a natural relation of simplicity to cunning, of ignorance to knowledge, or weakness to power. The first man who ever imbibed or conceived the fatal delusion that it was more advantageous to him, or to any human being to procure whatever his necessities or his appetite required by address and scheming than by honest work, by the unrequited rather than the fairly and faithfully recompensed toil of his fellow-creatures, was in essence and in heart a slaveholder and only awaited opportunity to become one indeed in practice.

We boast of having liberated four millions of slaves. True we have stricken the shackles from the former bondsmen and brought all laborers to a common level, but not so much by elevating the former slave as by reducing the whole working population to a state of practical serfdom. While boasting of our noble deeds we are careful to conceal the ugly fact that by our iniquitous monetary system we have pratically nationalized a system of oppression which, though more refined, is only less cruel than the old system of chattel slavery.

Again, as to the mode of operation, I quote from the same pamphlet:

It is entirely unnecessary to say anything in this connection in relation to the business of the bankers and usurers, for all know that they are governed by self-interest without regard to the public good. But a word in reference to the business of the intelligent business men who manifest so much interest in the financial legislation of the Government may not be amiss, for it would be very natural, and doubtless many do suppose that they are the energetic, enterprising portion of the community who are engaged in the development of our resources, but this is not so. They are the speculators in gold, stocks, food, clothing, and all other products of labor—the mere retainers of the banks, standing between the producer and consumer, amassing fortunes by a species of the worst kind of gambling. The banks will be the medium through which this centralized money power will operate; they will be located in every village and at every cross-roads, forming a complete system of financial espionage throughout the length and breadth of the land. With their agents or spies, under the revenue system, these bankers, usurers, and speculators will be able to obtain full knowledge of the business of every miner, farmer, mechanic, manufacturer, merchant, railroad company, and other enterprise in the nation. This will enable them to operate understandingly, and with their unrestricted power over the currency or money of the nation they can by extortionate rates of interest make every other interest or business, however important, subservient to their cupidity and tax the industrial classes until they become as helpless as the fly on the spider's web—tax their manhood out of them.

Let me ask if subsequent events have not established the correctness of every charge here made?

Banks will be located at all points of any business importance, and through those directly interested as well as those dependent upon them for financial favors they can and will control the primary caucuses and local conventions. They will also control the public press; indeed the metropolitan press, both secular and religious, is now with few exceptions the advocate and defenders of this system. Through these means they will be able to dictate party platforms and nominations, both State and national, and no person will be permitted to occupy any place of public trust who is not subservient to this power. This is to a great extent the case at this time, so far at least as the officers having charge of the financial department of the Government is concerned. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as it relates to the subject of currency and finance, and the report of the Comptroller of the Currency throughout, are made up of mere special pleadings for the banks. If this system should become the settled financial policy of the Government, it will not be long until Congress will be composed mainly of stockholders and attorneys of the banks, and every other department of the public service, from the Chief Executive down to the lowest officer, filled with men directly pecuniarily interested in those institutions. Then, instead of "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," we shall have as complete and absolute a money oligarchy as it would be possible to create by law.

This same power has grossly deceived or corrupted our religious teachers, for not being able rationally to account for the great inequalities of wealth and condition existing in society, and being expected to furnish a satisfactory explanation in some way, they tell the people that these great wrongs are providential; that they are the mysterious workings of the providence of God; that all these evils are controlled by His power and goodness.

A more false and impious charge was never uttered; for usury, the principle upon which these unjust and oppressive monetary laws are founded, is forbidden, censured, and condemned equally with slavery and robbery, and those who practice it anathematized by the word of inspired truth from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Revelations. It is the source of most of the vices and animosities of society. "A standard that deprives producers of what justly belongs to them and bestows on non-producers what does not belong to them cannot fail to corrupt society in all its branches." (See Exodus xxii, 25; Leviticus xxv, 35, 36, and 37; also 44, 45, and 46; Deuteronomy xxiii, 19 and 20; Nehemiah v; Psalms xv, 5; Ezekiel xviii and xxii.)

The term usury as now understood means illegal interest or a greater rate than is authorized by statutory law, but in the Scriptures it signified any rate, however small. The Jews were prohibited from demanding or receiving any consideration from one of their own nation for the loan of money, but were permitted to take interest from the heathen or enemy.

A circulating medium being indispensable to a free and convenient exchange of property and products and the payment of debts, it is not enough to show that the system through which this is now furnished is wrong in principle and practice, but it is necessary to offer one more correct in principle and better adapted to the end in view. This the advocates of what they denominate propose to provide by the issue of Treasury certificates in payment of the debts and current expenditures of the Government, which certificates shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts public and private, (except that portion of the national debt which is by express law made payable in coin,) and interconvertible at the option of the holder with registered Government bonds bearing an equitable rate of interest, not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum.

It is claimed for this system—

1. That it is adapted to our theory of government and in harmony with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, which clothes Congress with plenary powers over the currency or money of the nation, and charges it with the duty of providing the people with a safe and convenient circulating medium, adequate to the demands of the industrial and commercial interests.

2. That it would restore the power over the currency to the nation, to whom it belongs, but which has been filched from it by banking corporations, and provide the people with a medium of exchange directly under the control of those who produce and distribute the property it is designed to represent and exchange, and in which each citizen would be interested to the extent of his wealth or the amount of property he might have to exchange, and have a corresponding influence in its management and regulation.

3. That it would be just in its bearings on all classes and interests as well as to all sections of the country. Under its operation the currency or money would, without any legal enactment regulating its distribution, naturally flow to the section of the country and into the pockets of the individuals producing the wealth, and not, as under the present system, to the money centers and into vaults of the banks and the pockets of the usurers, whither it is attracted by extortionate rates of interest.

4. That it would be self-adjusting and possess the elasticity necessary to adapt it to the ebb and flow of trade; for if, at any time, the amount in circulation should be insufficient to meet the demands of legitimate business, the rate of interest would advance, which would cause the bonds to be exchanged for currency. On the other hand, should the volume in circulation be in excess of the demands of trade and the rate of interest in ordinary business transactions fall to or below the rate paid on the Government bonds, the currency would be converted into bonds to the extent necessary to restore the proper equilibrium. Thus it would prevent all violent expansions and contractions of the volume of the currency as well as the high and fluctuating rates of interest on loanable capital which have in the past proven and must, so long as the present system is continued in operation, prove detrimental to all useful industry and legitimate enterprise.

5. That it would establish an equitable standard of distribution to capital and labor, which is the most important function of a circulating medium, or rather of a monetary system. With the rate of interest on the Government bonds sufficiently below the rate of increase in the national wealth by productive industry to make an equitable division of the joint earnings of money or non-producing capital and labor, those who produce and distribute the wealth would receive a fair compensation for their services and capital a just reward for its use.

6. That it would furnish an honest currency and gives us a specie standard, for, when once fairly in operation, the bonds, into which the currency would be convertible at the will of the holder, would command the coin in the open market, and the currency would, of course, be par with coin. This the specie-basis fallacy never did, nor never can do, for it is an impossibility for either the banks or the Government to redeem $4 to $6 of circulation with $1 of coin; and the parties making this promise, whether it be the bankers or the Government, know that they cannot fulfill it in good faith, and it is, therefore, an act of dishonesty to make it.

7. That, resting, as it would, on public faith, which is the basis upon which our Government is founded, and being endowed by law with all the attributes of money, it would have a permanent value and uniform credit, and perform all the functions of a circulating medium, equally as well as coin—better, because more convenient and economical.

8. Advantageous as this system would be to the Government and people in an economical point of view, it would be equally important and desirable as a political measure. As upon the perpetuity of the Union of the States depends, in a great measure, the success of the republican principle of government, it should be the pride as it is the duty of all good citizens to subordinate mere personal interests and advantages to the attainment of this one grand object.

In dealing with this subject we must not lose sight of the fact that the mere abstract principle of political freedom is not, of itself, sufficient to secure the people in their rights and bind their affections to the Government. My deliberate judgment is that, with our varieties of climate and diversified productions and interests, it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to permanently maintain and perpetuate the Union of the States without some common bond of interest, which it is claimed the proposed monetary system will furnish. The currency would go into the possession of every citizen in the nation, even to the child who owned but a dime, and, if the bonds were issued in denominations as low as $25, they would afford the most safe and convenient form of investment for the means of the working classes, who constitute much the larger portion of our population. And as the value of both these classes of security would depend entirely upon the stability of the Government and the perpetuity of the Union, and as the system would greatly increase the rewards of labor in all branches of useful occupations, it would tend to attach the affections of the citizens of all classes and sections to the Government and unite them in one harmonious whole.

As I have on a former occasion contrasted the workings of this system and shown, as I believe, its superiority in all respects over the bankers' scheme, I shall not at this time undertake the discussion of the subject further than to say that, as it offers superior advantages to all the industrial classes, it has superior claims for their support. The bankers' system, while certainly securing great wealth to the few, represses enterprise and oppresses labor in all departments of useful occupation. On the other hand, the American monetary system, while encouraging enterprise and justly rewarding labor, will do no injustice to capital. Under the former capital will employ labor and the borrower will, as now, have to seek the lender, while under the latter labor will employ capital and the lender will have to seek the borrower. There is nothing wrong or unreasonable in this, for capital is the creature and labor the creator.

This financial question, affecting as it does the material interest of the whole people, will, despite the machinations of party leaders, continue to be the paramount political issue until it is satisfactorily disposed of. That it can be properly adjusted by either of the dominant political parties as now organized is, I think, doubtful; certainly not so long as they continue to draw their inspiration from Wall street and are controlled by the money power.

Fearing a defection on the part of the Middle and Western States that have heretofore supported their financial policy—not of choice, but of necessity—the bankers and usurers, with a view to retaining their power, contemplate a coalition between the States of New England, New York, and the Atlantic and cotton States where slavery formerly existed.

While it is to be hoped that this attempt may fail, it is nevertheless to be feared that through the changed condition of the people of the South it may prove a partial success.

We are not now, nor ever have been, a homogenous people. Previous to the late war we had three types of civilization. Geographically considered they may be divided as follows: The northern division, comprising the States of New England, New York, and those lying west in the same parallels of latitude; the middle divisions, including the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and those west in the same latitude; and the southern division, embracing the States south of those last named. The newer States in the middle belt were to some extent settled by immigration from both the other divisions, but mainly from Pennsylvania, and by foreign immigration, which until within the last quarter of a century located almost exclusively in this belt. As these settlers were generally persons of limited means and had to rely upon their labor for a subsistence and for the bettering of their condition, and as the fertility of the soil and abundance of mineral wealth offered encouragement to industry, production necessarily became the leading interest. Hence it is that we have had the greatest amount of production of agricultural and mineral wealth as well as the greatest variety of manufactures in this section. The acquisition of wealth depending mainly upon personal industry and economy, it is more equally distributed and there is less distinction in society on account of wealth here than in either of the other divisions. Here the organization of society and the laws governing the distribution of property, though far short of the divine command that in the sweat of his face man should eat bread or of the design of the founders of our institutions that all should enjoy the fruits of their labor and talents, are nevertheless a much nearer approach to both than in either of the other divisions. Consequently it is here that the truest type of American civilization is to be found. And if our institutions are to be restored and perpetuated in the spirit of justice, freedom, and legalized equality in which they were founded, it must be by and through the efforts of the occupants of this middle division, spreading to the north and south as you go west.

Commerce and usury are the leading interests in the northern, and agriculture in the southern divisions. In both of these sections the few have managed to acquire the productions of the labor of the many. A superficial view of society in these divisions would naturally lead to the conclusion that it was organized on directly opposite principles, but a careful examination of results will show that, though diverse in operation, the principle is the same in both—practical slavery—the difference being in the mode of abstracting the products of labor. Under the southern system capital owned labor, and the few controlled the many and appropriated the proceeds of their labor. Under the northern system the laboring class have a nominal freedom, but through banks of issue, savings-banks, life-insurance companies, and other like cunning contrivances—by their wits rather than by honest industry—the few have managed to abstract the products of the labor of the many beyond what was necessary for a mere subsistence.

The two latter divisions forming as they did the geographical extremes, and representing the extreme types of civilization, there existed between them an irreconcilable difference of opinion respecting the mode of administering government, each contending with unyielding determination for the supremacy or nationalization of their respective systems. An appeal to arms was had, which resulted in the abolishment of chattel slavery and the overthrow of the southern system. While the result has given the former slave a nominal freedom, it has not emancipated labor. Laborers in all sections and in all departments of useful industry and legitimate enterprise are still suffering from a system of oppression and injustice imposed on them by our iniquitous monetary laws, which, though more subtle and refined, is scarcely less unjust and oppressive than chattel slavery. By taking advantage of the financial necessities of the Government during the war, the advocates of the system for abstracting the products of labor by usury were enabled to so greatly extend and strengthen their power over the Government and people as to make them well-nigh masters of the situation. But this, like the system of chattel slavery, must be overthrown before the natural rights of the industrial classes can be established on a firm and enduring basis. This is the great problem presented to the American people for solution at this time.

Emboldened by their success in securing control of the currency and finances of the nation and encouraged by the depressed condition of the Southern States, the bankers and usurers now propose to retain control of the Government, to perpetuate their power and to nationalize their refined system of slavery in defiance of the Middle and Western States by forming a coalition with the Atlantic and cotton States. There are tens of thousands of middle-aged men in the South who have been reduced from affluence to poverty by the war and of young men who have been reared under the institution of slavery who it is not reasonable to suppose will consent to work in the field with the former slaves, if it be possible to avoid it. Seeing this, as well as the further fact that the States where slavery formerly existed and which are now in a state of transition are necessarily experiencing great financial embarrassment, the shrewd bankers of New York and New England propose to secure the influence of the former by providing them more congenial employment, and to induce the latter to accept the new system of slavery by affording them temporary financial relief. To this end they will establish national banks, savings-banks, life-insurance companies, and the other cunning fiscal contrivances by which they have been successful in appropriating the surplus earnings of labor in their own localities.

Whenever the influential men in the States named shall signify their willingness to accept the proffered terms, the governments of all those States will be turned over to them as soon as it can be done with a decent respect for the public sentiment in other States. Everything will then go on prosperously for a brief period, but will be followed by equal if not greater financial embarrassment than now exists, for neither agriculture nor any other branch of productive industry can long prosper with loanable capital at from 6 to 10 per cent., and the bankers and usurers of the East will not furnish it to their southern allies at less rates. It is to be hoped that they will not be successful in seducing any considerable number of the people of those States into the support of this scheme.

"Hard Times"—The Cause and the Remedy.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LAWRENCE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, it is one of the advantages of our system of government that all political questions are more fully discussed in this country than in any other. These questions are discussed in Congress, before public assemblages of the people, by the newspaper press, and in every conceivable form.

Wide differences of opinion on great questions early in our history created and have ever since continued in existence political parties. As these are arranged on opposite sides, a discussion of principles, of measures, of policy, and their results, becomes to a large extent an inquiry as to the merits or demerits of political parties.

For sixteen years the republican party has justly commanded the sanction and approval of the people.

In the closely contested presidential election through which we have but recently passed much was said of the embarrassed financial condition of the people, and this in some measure affected the result of the election. The same subject will continue to attract attention in the discussions and elections of the present year.

THE QUESTION OF "HARD TIMES" IN THE POLITICAL CONTEST OF 1876.

It was said in the discussions of 1876 that we have "hard times:" that the republican party has been in power for sixteen years and is responsible for these; that therefore the control of the Government should be given to the democratic party, in the hope of a change for the better.

It is my purpose to show that the "times" are not universally or even generally "hard;" that they are vastly better than under any democratic administration; that the republican party is in no degree censurable for any derangement of business which may exist; that it results from causes which no government could control; and that the policy of the republican party is the only one that can secure to labor its just rewards, bring prosperity to all our industries, and make it permanent.

If the farmer finds a ready market for all he can produce at fair prices and can buy all he needs in the same way, he is in a condition to prosper.

THE EFFECT OF THE WAR ON PRICES.

It is by no means fair to compare the present prices of farm products with the prices during the war and to say that because they are less now than then the "times are hard." The war took a million of men from industrial pursuits and made them consumers instead of producers. The Government became the great purchaser. The result was that with the increased demand and the reduced means of production prices went up enormously and abnormally. This was largely enhanced too by a depreciated and inflated currency, so that the advance was in some degree nominal, and not real. The cost of every article to be purchased by the farmer was also increased, so that his profits did not increase as rapidly as the market price of his products grew.

So far as the condition of the farming industry can be measured by a comparison of the prices of farm products at different periods, it should be between prices now and prior to the war: between 1860 and 1877. And I say, what we all know and statistics will prove, that farm products, even now suffering from the effects of the panic of September, 1873, command better prices than in 1860 or any former period, and all that a farmer consumes can be bought for less than in 1860 or any earlier period. (See Young's Labor in Europe and America.) Even now, as a general rule, all through the interior States wheat commands a dollar a bushel, and shipping-hogs over $5 per hundred pounds gross, at which price corn should command forty cents a bushel. These are better prices than were realized in democratic times prior to the war. And there is a ready market for every farm product.

I know that wool and some other products were during a part of the past year temporarily depressed; but in democratic times, prior to the war, they were very generally so.

The policy of the republican party is to build up home markets, by encouraging home manufactures, without in any sense taxing one portion of the people for the benefit of another, and thus to secure good prices for all our agricultural products and permanent prosperity to all our industries.

LABORERS AND MECHANICS.

But how about our laborers and mechanics? Do they find employment and fair wages? I do not deny that there has been recently to some extent a temporary depression in some branches of industry; but I affirm that even with this the laborers and mechanics of this country find better employment and better wages than in any other country and better than under any democratic administration of our Government.

Edward Young, the ablest statistician in the United States, in his work on Labor in Europe and America, published in 1875, says that the immigration to this country from Europe proves "the great advantages enjoyed by the workingmen" here "as compared with the same class in the Old World," and he says one reason is the "solid and decided advantages connected with abundant employment, good wages, and the substantial comforts of life." And he adds:

It is true that in common with other countries where the system of credit has been largely developed, our country has had its occasional financial crises, accompanied with serious interruptions to the ordinary course of commerce and industry; but such effects have been comparatively transient in their duration, and the normal condition of the country has been marked by a degree of prosperity rarely if ever enjoyed elsewhere; and rarely, if ever, in the history of the world has national prosperity been so largely shared by those usually denominated the working classes.

He also furnishes statistical tables which show that the wages of labor, mechanical and otherwise, have increased from the democratic times of 1860 to the republican era of 1874, even then suffering from the panic of 1873, on an average of about 40 per cent., while the cost of supporting families has been in many articles reduced.

Mechanics and laborers even now are in better condition than ever under democratic rule. And so now are all industries more prosperous than under democratic rule.

ALL INDUSTRIES MORE PROSPEROUS THAN UNDER DEMOCRATIC RULE.

On this subject it is sufficient to recall the memories of those times and to cite some evidences of them.

On the 15th of May, 1850, Mr. Calvin, of Pennsylvania, spoke very truly in Congress of the condition of the industries of that State as follows:

The coal-mines of our State, in which millions of capital have been invested have been rendered unproductive, unprofitable. Some have been sold by the sheriff; others abandoned to dilapidation and ruin. I am informed that the sheriff is the only man now making money in the great coal-fields of Schuylkill County; and that the population of that county has been reduced about four thousand within the last twelve or fourteen months. A large portion of our numerous iron establishments throughout the State—I would say the larger portion of them—have been broken up, sold by the sheriff, or have suspended.

Seven years later a democratic President, Mr. Buchanan, in his message to Congress of 1857, said:

We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty * * * we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

The evidence on this subject might be abundantly multiplied by statistics showing the meager wages paid to mechanics and laborers, the meager results of manufacturing, mining, mechanical, and agricultural industry; the slow progress in wealth, and the means of substantial comfort under democratic administrations, and the vast improvement and progress in all these under republican rule in the last sixteen years.

INCREASE OF WEALTH UNDER REPUBLICAN RULE.

The republican party came into power on the 4th of March, 1861. A democratic rebellion cost $4,000,000,000 of money and an ocean of blood. It dug 350,000 loyal graves and for four years took a million of men from industrial pursuits. They engaged in the destruction of wealth. This alone was sufficient to make and keep "hard times" during the whole period. Yet our systems of revenue and currency have been so wisely directed by republican policy, they have so protected and encouraged our industries that our population and wealth have alike grown beyond the example of any former period of this or any other country, and the whole people, up to the panic of September 18, 1873, enjoyed unexampled prosperity. A brief table will show some of the results of republican rule, as follows:

	1860.	1870.	Gain.
Population	31,443,321	38,558,371	7,115,050
Products of manufactures	$1,876,893,377	$4,208,824,971	$2,331,931,594
Products of agriculture	.....	2,447,538,658	.....
True wealth	16,159,616,068	30,068,518,507	13,908,902,439
Assessed value, real estate	4,797,889,143	7,926,390,535	3,128,501,392

The estimate of wealth for 1860 includes slaves, no longer wealth in 1870, and yet with all the disadvantages and destruction of war how wonderful has been the increase in all that makes a nation and individual people prosperous and happy! Yet these are but a part of the achievements of the republican party. The "homestead policy," so long rejected by the democratic party, has populated whole States and given homes to the people. The two oceans have been united by three thousand miles of railways crossing deserts, mountains, and wide regions of wilderness, and similar highways of commerce and travel have penetrated every populous portion of the land.

Within this time more has been done for human liberty, for civil and political rights, for education, and the advance of our race in material wealth and moral progress than had been done in the eighty years preceding the era of republican rule, and to-day our people are free, happy, and generally prosperous.

SOME INDUSTRIES EMBARRASSED.

Since the panic of September 18, 1873, some branches of our industry have been depressed, men who were too much in debt have suffered, some have "failed," and the evils of "hard times" have been to some extent felt for the first time under republican rule.

If these evils could have been averted, if they grew out of bad legislation or a mistaken policy of finance or currency, it would not follow that the democratic party constitute the proper agency to afford relief. The republican party, which secured so long a period of prosperity under the most trying difficulties that ever afflicted the nation, can safely be trusted to lead the people out of the comparatively insignificant embarrassment which they now encounter.

It is the part of wisdom and statesmanship to ascertain the cause of the difficulty and to apply the proper remedy.

When we do this we will find that whatever evils exist grew out of a democratic rebellion and its consequences or the means imperatively required and employed to suppress it; that the democratic party, unable to comprehend the cause, neither promise nor propose nor can furnish any adequate means of relief, while the policy of the republican party will surely, steadily, and as speedily as possible restore prosperity to all our industries and make it substantially and generally permanent.

WHAT ARE NOT THE CAUSES.

The democratic party are unwilling to comprehend the real cause of the difficulty—the rebellion. To admit it is to offend the sensibilities of the democracy in the late insurrectionary Southern States, to which the party look mainly for success and in which exists its controlling element of power.

TILDEN'S THEORY OF THE CAUSE.

Mr. Tilden, in his letter of July 31, 1876, accepting the democratic nomination as a candidate for the Presidency, says:

The present depression in all the business and industries of the people, which is depriving labor of its employment and carrying want into so many homes, has its principal cause in excessive governmental consumption, under the illusions of a specious prosperity engendered by the false policies of the Federal Government. A waste of capital has been going on ever since the peace of 1865 which could only end in universal disaster. It was aggravated, moreover, by a financial policy which tended to diminish the energy, skill, and economy of production, and the frugality of private consumption, and induced miscalculation in business and an unremunerative use of capital and labor.

The "principal cause" "excessive governmental consumption," in plain English high taxes by the National Government, so says Tilden! If this be true, it is a disingenuous confession that existing evils are chargeable to a democratic rebellion, but so made as to censure the republican party for collecting the revenues necessary to suppress it, and pay the interest on the debt it created, and the pensions of soldiers it made necessary. These expenditures, whatever they were, were absolutely necessary. The democratic party would not have made them less if in power, unless it had refused to incur the expense necessary to suppress the rebellion. The republican party is in no way responsible for war expenses. If these be deducted from the total cost of Government expenses, and the proper allowance made for the difference between gold payments in 1860 and paper since, it will be found the ordinary expenses per capita of population under republican rule were less than under the last democratic administration. In 1860, under democratic rule, with a population of 31,000,000, the net ordinary expenses were $2.04 per capita, while in 1875, with a population of 44,000,000, they are less than $1.70. This is shown by an official state ment of the Treasury Department, as follows:

Comparison of the expenditures of 1875 with those of 1860.

A report made by the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the expenses of the last eleven years ending with June 30, 1876, were as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1866	$520,809,416 99
1867	357,542,675 16
1868	377,340,284 86
1869	322,865,277 80
1870	309,653,560 75
1871	292,177,188 25

1875	274,623,392 84
1876	258,459,797 33
Making total amount of expenditures in the last eleven years	3,568,468,675 15

Here is shown alike the enormous expenses growing out of a democratic rebellion and a rapid and regular reduction by a republican Congress.

The same is shown by the interest on the public debt, and its speedy reduction, as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30—
1866	$133,067,741 69
1867	143,781,591 91
1868	140,424,045 71
1869	130,694,242 80
1870	129,235,498 00
1871	125,576,565 93
1872	117,357,839 72
1873	104,750,688 44
1874	107,119,815 21
1875	103,093,544 57
1876	100,243,271 23
Total interest paid on public debt in the last eleven years	1,335,144,845 21

The reduction of taxation since the close of the war has been as follows:

In internal revenue.

By the act of July 13, 1866	$65,000,000
By the act of March 2, 1867	40,000,000
By the act of February 3, 1868	23,000,000
By the act of March 31, 1868, and July 20, 1868	45,000,000
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,000,000
By the act of June 6, 1872	20,651,000
Making total reduction of internal-revenue taxes for each year since 1872	248,651,000

In customs dues.

By the act of July 14, 1870	$29,526,410
By the acts of May 1 and June 6, 1872	31,172,761
Making total reduction in customs dues for each year	60,699,171

The total reduction under these several acts is $309,350,171. The average annual reduction since the war and down to 1875, when the democracy came into absolute control of the House, is $30,935,017.10.

The republican party has been cutting down as rapidly as possible this "governmental consumption."

The expenses have been reduced from $520,809,416.99, in 1866, to $258,459,797.33 for the fiscal year 1876.

HOW DEMOCRATS WOULD INCREASE EXPENSES.

If the democratic party should come into power, the "governmental consumption" would be vastly increased by the payment of war claims from the late rebel States. I do not ask you to rely solely on republican proof of this. On the 20th of May, 1870, my distinguished friend, Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, one of the ablest of the democratic Representatives on this floor, a Representative from Kentucky, made a speech in this House in which he said:

Besides this, we owe, at the very lowest calculation, $3,000,000,000, not to the bloated bondholder of whom we have heard so much, but to a class of our people to whom, of all others, we are under the most sacred obligations to pay. We owe it to the poor whose horses, and cattle, and sheep, and corn, and wheat, and everything else were taken from them to sustain your armies in the field.

In this speech he undoubtedly refers, as I suppose, to the claims of men who were disloyal as well as loyal; and his demand, as I must infer, is that we pay all these.

There is now pending in Congress bills to refund the tax on raw cotton in the rebel States collected from 1863 to 1868, inclusive, $68,072,388.79; and to refund $2,492,110 of direct taxes collected for war purposes in the eleven late rebel States, during and since the war; and to remit $2,661,776 now due, but not yet collected, under the act of Congress of 1861, though the loyal States have paid the proportion assessed upon them, $14,846,114. A bill is pending proposing to pay "all citizens," rebel as well as loyal, "for the use and occupation of their property by the United States Army during the late civil war."

A bill is pending proposing to pay "all citizens," rebel as well as loyal, "for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army."

These claims in all would probably reach $2,000,000,000, or as much as our whole remaining national debt. Missouri, Tennessee, and other States have passed laws under which commissioners have audited and allowed rebel war claims amounting to many millions payable when collected from the National Treasury. The republican party will pay no such claims as these. These claims would indeed bring a vast "governmental consumption." It so happened that in the Forty-third Congress I was chairman of the Committee on War Claims. I had the privilege of making a report to Congress covering the whole subject of these claims and proving by abundant law authorities that the Government was under no obligation to pay any such claims. This report was published in some of the leading law journals of the country, it was reprinted at least four times under the authority of a republican Congress and House of Representatives, and Secretary Fish ordered copies printed to be sent to foreign governments. It denies that Congress is under any obligation to pay such claims, and while the republican party shall continue in power the principles of that report will, as I have no doubt, be sustained—not because it is mine, but because it is supported by sound law and justice, and will save the Government hundreds of millions of dollars.

The democratic party, on the other hand, would pay these claims if they should come into power. I know that on the eve of the late presidential election Mr. Tilden, for the purpose of obtaining votes in the Northern States, and when it was too late to have his professions fully understood in the South, wrote a letter declaring his opposition to the payment of these claims. But in this he did not reflect the purpose of the democratic party. This is shown by the proceedings in this House on the 8th of January, as follows:

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

"Whereas on the 18th day of December, 1876, the following preamble and resolution passed this House by a vote of 152 yeas to 63 nays, to wit:

"'Whereas fears have been and still are entertained by the people of the United States that Congress may at some time in the future pass laws by which the Government of the United States may be compelled to pay a large amount for damages that were incurred during the late war by persons residing within the States that were then in rebellion against the United States: Therefore, in order to allay such fears and prevent the payment of such claims,

"'Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to this House within twenty days, and permission is hereby given for that purpose, an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in substance as follows, to wit:

"'ARTICLE XVI.

"'No claim shall ever hereafter be allowed or paid by the United States, in the shape of damages or otherwise, for any kind of property, real or personal, used, consumed, injured, or destroyed by United States troops, or by or through any officers, civil or military, acting under or by authority of the United States, or from any other cause whatever, during the suppression of the late rebellion in any of the States that were in rebellion against the Government of the United States; or, for any property used, consumed, injured, or destroyed during such rebellion outside of said States that were in rebellion, and which belonged to persons residing within such States that were in rebellion, unless the persons owning the property so used, consumed, injured, or destroyed were during all the time of such rebellion loyal to the Government of the United States, and gave neither aid nor encouragement to the enemy.'

"And whereas said twenty days mentioned in said resolution expired on the 7th day of the present month, and said Committee on the Judiciary has failed to report an amendment to the Constitution, as instructed by this House in said resolution so to do within said twenty days: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That said Committee on the Judiciary be required to report within two days from this date an amendment to the Constitution as above provided for in said resolution, and permission to report the same is hereby given."

Mr. REAGAN. I object. I would inquire whether the main purpose of this is not covered by the latter clause, and whether it is not meant by that to decide existing lawsuits and confiscate property not otherwise confiscated under the law?

Mr. HUNTER. I object to debate, and move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted.

Mr. PAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 126, nays 71, not voting 92; as follows:

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

It is a notorious fact that wherever the democratic party is strongly intrenched in power there the expenses of administering government have been enormous, extravagant, and often corrupt to a fearful degree, as in New York City. The Commercial and Financial Chronicle of February 10 gives the following account of the debt of that city:

The debt began as a small matter, not expected to become large, in the authorization—as "a permanent arrangement of the finances of the city"—of a $900,000 loan, in 1812; and although there were two more issues during the next seventeen years, the net aggregate was reduced by repayments. The following shows the progress at intervals of five years down to 1870, and annually since that year:

End of year.	Net bonded debt.	Valuation of taxable prop'ty.	Ratio of debt to valuation.
1830	$774,555	$125,278,518	0.62
1835	902,534	218,723,703	0.41

Here is a debt in that one democratic city, which is equivalent to a mortgage on its whole property equal to more than 10 per cent. of its value. Here are taxes vastly greater than in any city or State in the Union in proportion to wealth and population.

*This is the amount actually paid in the year. The city's share of State tax for the year was $2,023,275 less, that amount belonging to some other year, although paid in 1875-'76.

And this is not all of the debt of that great city. Thousands of suits are pending against the city for claims which will largely add to the debt.

THE WISDOM OF REPUBLICAN REVENUE SYSTEM.

The total public expenses for the fiscal year 1876 were $258,459,797.33, exclusive of money paid in reducing the national debt.

The total revenues for 1875 were $288,000,051.10. It is by no means true, as Mr. Tilden alleges, that these revenues are the "principal cause" of the "present depression."

They are so levied and collected as to avoid in a great degree any injury to the business of the country. They are not levied on farms, or horses, or cattle, or the tools of the mechanic, or the sources of productive industry. They are in large part collected from luxuries, and so discourage extravagance, promote morals, and encourage industry. Let me give some of the sources of our revenue. In 1875 the Government collected from whisky, $52,081,991.12; from fermented liquors, $9,144,004.41; from tobacco, $37,303,461.88; from private banks, $4,097,268.12; from national banks, $7,268,379.16, and from duties on foreign imported goods, $157,167,722.35. Nearly one-half of these imported goods were luxuries, and the residue were mainly articles which came in competition with the labor of our mechanics, and a duty on which gave encouragement and protection to our mechanics and laborers.

Congress has been reducing our national taxes as rapidly as possible, and with the increase of population and wealth these may be further reduced.

It is safe to trust the republican party with the control of the revenues, for in the last sixteen years their management has been a marvel of success. The total receipts from domestic spirits from 1863 to 1875, inclusive, were $489,763,999.

The taxes levied under State and local authorities have been and are oppressive, and these should be reduced, very largely reduced. But none of these go into the National Treasury, and these taxes have been largest and most oppressive where the democratic party held control, as in New York City.

NO CONTRACTION OF CURRENCY PRODUCING "HARD TIMES."

The democratic party of Ohio, in their platform of June 17, 1875, alleged that "hard times" were produced by two causes: contraction of the currency, and the proposition to resume specie payments. The platform said:

That the contraction of the currency, heretofore made by the republican party, and the further contraction proposed by it with a view to the forced resumption of specie payment, has already brought disaster to the business of the country, and threatens it with general bankruptcy and ruin.

The so-called "greenback party" of 1876 in their platform of May 18, at Indianapolis, express substantially the same view.

1. To this I reply:

It is not true that there has been any contraction of the currency, either to produce the panic of September, 1873, or hard times since. It is conceded on all hands that every branch of industry was prosperous during the war and up to the panic of September 18, 1873. They prospered in 1869 and 1870 and 1871 and 1872. Yet during those years there was no contraction. There was a gradual increase in each successive year up to 1876. The paper-money circulation is shown by the following:

The small amount of compound-interest notes under the act of 1863 and so-called "seven-thirty" Treasury notes under the act of June 30, 1864, bore interest and never circulated to any considerable extent as money. They had been canceled prior to 1868. They were issued when the Government alone for war purposes used two millions a day, and often more, and they were temporary in their character and could not affect business in 1873.

The act of June 20, 1874, released bank "reserves" on circulation and increased the volume of currency for actual use.

The so-called "resumption act" of January 14, 1875, authorized free banking, so that there has been since that time no limit on the authorized amount of bank circulation. Any company that will deposit Government bonds in the Treasury as security for circulating notes can organize a bank, and thus the amount of currency is left to be determined by "the wants of trade."

From this, it will be seen we are not afflicted with any want or scarcity of money. Money is abundant and can be loaned at lower rates than ever before in all the great cities, because "the wants of trade" do not require the use of all that is there. There has in fact within the last year been a reduction of the bank-note circulation by the surrender of it by banks, and because especially in the great cities the wants of trade did not require it. (McPherson's Manual, 1876, page 251.)

Our total money up to and on July 1, 1876, was as follows:

Greenbacks	$369,772,284
National-bank notes	332,998,336
Fractional currency	34,446,595
Estimated small silver coin	15,000,000
Total	752,217,215
Gold coin	160,000,000
Total	912,217,215

That is, we have $17 per head of our population in paper money and nearly $4 per capita of coin; which is all of 2¼ per cent. on our total wealth. In democratic times our money was less abundant. In January, 1861, the account was as follows:

Bank-note circulation	$207,102,477
Coin in circulation	84,002,476
Coin in banks	83,594,567
Coin in Treasury	10,160,000

The coin and currency in actual circulation did not reach $10 per capita of population, and was only equal to 1.82 per cent. of our total wealth.

The coin and paper circulation in Great Britain and Ireland in 1873 was only $21.45 per capita and only 1½ per cent. on the total wealth of the country.

In the North German States in 1873 the coin and paper money were equal to $20 per capita. In France the lands are owned in small tracts, the people hoard money largely, and the paper and coin are larger per capita than here, but they are only equal to 1.8 per cent. of the total wealth, and much of this is not in actual use or circulation. No man now ever hears of any difficulty in selling crops or farm products because there is no money to buy them. There is a ready sale for cash for all that any farmer is ready to sell.

It is not true, then, that "hard times" are produced either by contraction or the want of a sufficient volume of currency.

2. It is not true that the proposition for a future resumption of specie payments has brought "hard times."

Whatever there is of "hard times" commenced with the panic of September, 1873. The so-called resumption act was not passed until January 14, 1875, sixteen months after the difficulty was developed. Business has since been gradually improving, because we are approaching the solid times of a currency that will not fluctuate in value, and which, by its stability, will restore confidence and invite capital into remunerative enterprises.

TWO DEMOCRATIC WITNESSES.

Now, I propose to prove by two democratic witnesses that the proposition for resumption has not produced the difficulty. They are democrats of prominence—no less personages than Hon. ALLEN G. THURMAN, the able democratic Ohio Senator, and Samuel J. Tilden, the lately defeated democratic candidate for the Presidency.

On the 24th of March, 1874, Mr. THURMAN said, in a speech in the Senate:

The panic was the result of overtrading, excessive indebtedness, and of congressional legislation; it was overtrading, running too much into debt, embarking in unremunerative enterprises, and, notably, it was the North Pacific Railroad enterprise, that had been stimulated by Congress, which brought about that panic. Never did I say that that panic was the result of an attempt to resume specie payment, for nobody could say that or think it who knew anything about the subject. Never did any man hear me utter one word in favor of inflation; not one word, sir. I have spoken against a contraction of the currency that would bring about too speedily a resumption of specie payments, but never have I spoken in favor of that inflation of the currency which, I think I see full well, means that there never shall be any resumption at all * * * And that is precisely what this inflation means; it means demonetizing gold and silver in perpetuity, and substituting a currency of irredeemable paper based wholly and entirely upon Government credit, and depending upon the opinion and the interests of members of Congress and their hopes of popularity, whether the volume of it shall be large or whether it shall be small. That is what this inflation means. Sir, I have never said anything in favor of that; I am too old-fashioned a democrat for that. I have heard and preached too many hard-money lessons to advocate such a theory as that.

This is the testimony of Senator THURMAN:

Tilden is no less explicit. I have already shown that he declares "excessive governmental consumption" is the "principal cause" of the depression in business. He scouts the idea that there has been any contraction or proposition for resumption which produces any such result.

I shall have occasion to allude to the effect of resumption, the proper time for it, and the means, when I come to consider the remedies for such difficulties as now exist.

Again, Mr. Tilden, in his letter of acceptance, says of resumption that—

Discreetly pursued, it ought not to cost any sacrifice to the business of the country. It should tend, on the contrary, to a revival of hope and confidence.

Tilden, as governor of New York, himself approved a law of that State requiring all taxes to be paid in coin after January, 1879. He approved a law requiring all money contracts to be paid in coin after January 1, 1879, unless otherwise specified. The proposition for resumption at a future day is by no means the cause of the difficulty.

THE REAL CAUSES OF EMBARRASSMENT.

The real causes of our present difficulties may be traced to the rebellion. The means which were found absolutely necessary to suppress it were devised with great wisdom and employed with great skill, but no human foresight could avert some consequences which followed and brought disturbances to our industries. It is only profitable now to examine these, with a view to know and apply the proper remedies.

As I have already said, the war took a million of men from industrial pursuits. The war was vastly destructive. The Government became a great purchaser of the products of the farm, the workshop, and of nearly every industry to maintain our armies and carry on the war. The meager amount of money in the country under a democratic administration was by no means adequate to carry on a war which required $2,000,000 a day. The banks in existence at the outbreak of the rebellion, with their paper circulation of $207,102,477, lacked ability and could not command the confidence of the people. It became necessary to drive them out of existence, as Congress did finally by taxing their unreliable circulation. It was better, indeed, than the illegal currency issued by certain companies in Michigan during the war, but it did not meet the demands of the times either in value or amount.

Congress issued "greenbacks," and made them a legal tender under the act of February 25, 1862, and subsequent acts, with a solemn promise in the law that "the total amount issued or to be issued" should never "exceed $400,000,000." This pledge has been sacredly kept. The war went on. More money was needed. The national banking system was devised, which answered the double purpose of making a market for our national bonds and of increasing the volume of currency. This gave the Treasury the money without which the rebellion could not have been suppressed. Money, "the sinews of war," saved the Republic, second only in importance to our brave and true soldiers.

The immense and increased demand for all the products of industry stimulated production; as the demand increased, the prices advanced also. Farms, city and town property, everything, advanced in price. An inflated currency aided the increase in price, gave the means of enlarged credit, increased debts, and brought inevitably extravagance. The city and village population increased relatively more than the rural population, and too much of this engaged in speculation, in merchandising, in vending products, and overcrowded competition brought reduced profits and sometimes failures.

When the war closed in 1865 more than a million of men returned to private life, and many of them became producers rather than consumers. The Government ceased to be a rival purchaser in the market and all prices gradually, but inevitably, receded. So it has been after every great war, and no government can prevent it.

SIX CAUSES OF HARD TIMES.

In the history of these times we may trace six principal causes of the present embarrassment—(1) speculation, (2) extravagance, (3) excessive imports, (4) debt, public and private, (5) the construction of railroads at extravagant prices on credit beyond a present remunerative demand and often through fraudulent agencies, and last, but not least, (6) a general shrinkage of prices.

There is but one source of wealth—labor. It alone creates tangible wealth. It may be aided by capital, but it is labor that fells our forests and converts them into houses and implements useful for the convenience and comfort of man. Labor digs our mineral wealth from the earth and adapts it to human wants. Labor is the all in all of the real source of wealth. The mere issue of paper money creates no wealth. It is a substitute for money, a means of employing credit, but it is not money; it is an evidence of debt.

Speculation merely adds nothing to wealth. Yet speculation inevitably grew out of the condition of things which existed during and after the war.

Extravagance is a vast destroyer of wealth. It consumes like a devouring element and ends in financial ruin. The abundant currency, the advancing prices, and the facilities for credit and debt inevitably led to extravagance. The Government was powerless to prevent it.

Excessive imports came because our high prices made this an inviting market in which to sell. The same reason made it an indifferent market in which to buy, and exports did not keep pace with imports. In the eleven and a half years preceding January, 1874, we imported "luxuries and unnecessaries" $754,155,451, including wines and spirits, $68,824,725; silks, $253,905,823; kid gloves, $28,793,475; fancy goods and perfumery, $45,224,518; embroideries, $13,578,959; dress goods, $185,575,758; precious stones, $19,705,476; tobacco and manufactures of, $24,029,734, &c. In addition, there were imports of glass, China-ware, fine linen, cotton, woolen, and leather goods, books, fine cutlery, and expensive clothing amounting to $112,000,000. We exported gold and silver in excess of imports, $681,946,077; the balance of trade was against us $378,589,654. A nation which buys more than it sells, like an individual, must, sooner or later, feel "hard times."

Public and private debts were created to a vast amount. Besides the national debt the States owe debts $390,000,000, the towns and cities $570,000,000, the counties $180,000,000, or in all $1,140,000 000. Railroad companies created debts reaching $1,511,578,944. The volume of private indebtedness at home increased until notes, mortgages, and book accounts reached $1,500,000,000, or more, besides the indebtedness to banks. While debts were being created the demand for employment in the expenditure of the means they brought, increased and gave us an abnormal but temporary prosperity. The time came when we could create no more debt, and then the demand for labor from that source ceased, and the pressure of hard times with laborers out of employment commenced.

Many of these debts were evidenced by bonds bearing 7, 8, 10, and even 12 per cent. interest per annum—especially the county and other municipal and corporate bonds. This made a demand for money at high rates of interest and rendered it impossible to procure money at fair rates for legitimate manufacturing and other industrial enterprises. These can only be made successful when capital can be procured at reasonable rates.

The construction of railroads on borrowed capital in excess of remunerative demand aggravated the evil. In the five years preceding January, 1873, railroads were constructed at an annual cost of $340.-000,000; in all, $1,700,000,000, which is more than half the cost of all our railroads, but the railroad companies owe bonds and other debts, $1,511,578,949.

According to the Journal des débats, of France, there were constructed in the United States, almost entirely in the Western States:

In 1872, miles of railroad	7,400
In 1873, miles of railroad	3,850
In 1874, miles of railroad	3,036
In January, February, and March of 1875, miles of railroad	184

This gave employment to men, made a demand for agricultural products and foreign and domestic goods to feed and clothe them and for an immense product of iron. Hundreds of new blast-furnances were started, adding to the demand for labor.

When the roads were all built and the demand for more had ceased men were thrown out of employment, the demand for iron was largely reduced, furnances went out of blast, and the pressure of "hard times" was felt. The demand for foreign and domestic goods diminished, and merchants, in common with others, felt the consequences. Many of the railroads constructed by "rings" and "construction companies," invented by Tilden, at prices three times greater than their real cost, were unprofitable. Fictitious and "watered" stock and bonds inadequately secured proved worthless, and bondholders and stockholders and the people all alike felt the consequences. The failure of the Northern Pacific Road with Jay Cooke & Co. in September, 1873, precipitated a financial panic. It has been said by J. D. Hayes, esq., of Detroit, that:

So eager were interested parties to make money at both ends of their projects that no less than from twelve to fifteen thousand miles of railroads were rushed to completion in about three years, mostly upon the proceeds of bonds sold, held, or pledged for money by their financial agents, and nearly all of which promised 8 per cent. gold interest. Bankers' and brokers' circulars and advertisements were spread over the country offering to pay 5 per cent. interest upon daily balances in New York and other large cities, when call loans could be had for very much less. By such means the surplus money of the country was attracted to the large cities, and deposits went there from banks, bankers, corporations, and individuals all over the country. In many cases these same bankers and brokers were also the financial agents of these newly projected railroads whose bonds promised so much. They could pay out these deposits to the railroad managers, contractors, and schemers, and receive back bonds to negotiate, while on those remaining unsold they could pay themselves the due coupons out of the capital, whereby they would secure about 8 per cent. of gold to themselves by paying 5 per cent. currency to their depositors, and when the bond was finally sold secure their large commission from the corporation. They "sold" the purchaser and their depositor at the same time with the bond, and this without investing any of their own capital. In some cases the contractors were only men of straw, working under the manipulations of some managers behind the scenes, who did not care to be known and disgraced when their schemes were exploded. One illustration will be sufficient, although a very bad one; many others partake of the same nature. One company with a nominal share capital of $10,000,000 are said to have had the full sum of $1,400 paid up, when they started out begging aid from towns, counties, and cities. They secured bonds and pledges for about $1,000,000, which netted only $700,000; next they issued bonds for $1,500,000, which netted $1,310,000, showing discounts and commissions upon the two sets of bonds of $190,000. The western division provided for such shrinkage by issuing bonds for $35,483 to the mile on its road and land grant, and promised 8 per cent. gold interest. Bonds for $5 000,000 cost $1,878,375 of this amount, and a stock bonus of $1,742,000 for negotiation.

Here we see both ends eating up the capital, to provide for which the bonds are made for about $11,000 per mile more than the roads cost to build, and the man at the other end takes the bonus for himself and his friends for floating them into the hands of the unsuspecting and over-confident capitalist, who has swallowed the promised 8 per cent. gold-interest bonds in exchange for his greenbacks. Is it any wonder that a panic, wide-spread and fearfully disastrous, was the result of the discovery of the fact that nearly or quite $1,000,000,000 had been swallowed up within a short period in building railroads, many of them having no real value at all, while others had only a prospective value in the distant future?

A distinguished citizen of Ohio, Hon. Aaron F. Perry, has given a truthful description of the times, as follows:

In 1875 the amount of liabilities of railroads, including liabilities over and above their bonds, was just about the entire amount of our national debt. The bonds were about two thousand millions, and other liabilities some two or three hundred millions beyond, making it not far from the exact amount of our national debt. A similar amount of stock was out, so that all that class of railroad paper issued upon those unsound transactions amounted to between four thousand and five thousand millions of dollars in 1875. The panic commenced September 18 or 20, 1873 It began by the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., of Philadelphia, contractors for the Northern Pacific Railroad, and bankers generally. Seven months before that time—that is to say, January 1, 1873—there had gone to protest $134,684,600 of railroad bonds for non-payment of interest, making thirty-seven companies that had gone to protest. At about the time of the panic there went to protest $91,740,500 of bonds issued by thirty-five companies. From September 20, 1873, to January 1, 1874, there went to protest $150,253,250 issued by twenty-five in default. During 1874, $202,366,701 in bonds of seventy-one companies went to default. And in 1875, $140,448,214 in bonds of twenty-five companies went to default. And in 1875 seventy companies had been taken into court for the amount of $387,675,615, and forty-four companies had been foreclosed for $159,373,300. Somewhere from fifteen hundred millions to two thousand millions of railroad paper, bonds, and stocks had fallen dead in the hands of the holders. It had been treated and valued as property, but was, temporarily at least, good for nothing.

Do we need anything more, fellow-citizens, to tell us what caused the panic and what caused the discharge of labor and the suspension of profitable industry? Those fictitious bonds and stocks are yet afloat in the country; they are packed up in masses in Wall street; they are looked upon as wealth, and scattered through the country; they are now owned by men who dislike to let it be known that they own them; men who are involved in endless financial difficulties, and are wasting years of their lives in the hope of struggling through and redeeming something from ruin. If a fire could have swept through Wall street and through every center where this paper was held, it would have burned up an enormous proportion of the poverty of the country, and it would have emancipated the men from their struggles to retrieve something, and from loss of time and effort to retrieve something, and would have set them free to go to work in other business. I submit that this accounts for the distress among laboringmen and the distress in business.

The panic came as the result of the extravagance that had been developed in war times, and the people awoke to realize the excesses into which the business of the country had been running.

The general shrinkage of prices completed these evils. Debts were to be paid. War prices could not be maintained. The debts grew with interest, the means of payment dwindled with the shrinkage of price. Property was thrown upon the market, the sellers were more numerous than buyers, and "hard times" existed as to improvident debtors, individuals and corporations.

REPUBLICAN PARTY NOT RESPONSIBLE.

The republican party is not responsible for any one of these disturbing causes. No party could have prevented them except the party that made and supported the rebellion. The republican party could not prevent speculation, nor extravagance among the people, nor the high prices which brought excessive imports or the creation of public and private debts, nor the construction of railroads in advance of remunerative demand. The abundant currency was a necessity which grew out of the war and high prices are inevitable in every great war. But for a protective tariff our imports would have been largely in excess of what they were. The very abundance of our prosperity, secured by wise republican financial measures, led incautious people into extravagance, debt, and speculation.

The "shrinkage of prices" was inevitable when the Government ceased to be a great buyer and consumer of products. But the "panic" and "hard times" were by no means so ruinous as those of 1816, of 1837, and of 1856, in democratic years. They continued for years, accompanied by ruin, wide-spread and universal. But now only a few of our industries are suffering, and these to a limited extent.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The evil of hard times exists in other countries. They exist in England now. They exist in Prussia. After the Franco-Prussian war, France paid a war fine of $1,000,000,000 to Prussia. This was a coin inflation, and it produced speculation, high prices, debt, and now all this is followed by a decline in prices and hard times there.

THE REMEDY—CAN RELY ON REPUBLICANS.

The inquiry which now concerns us all is, what is the appropriate remedy? Which party will most surely bring it?

NO DEMOCRATIC REMEDY.

The democratic party offers no real remedy. Mr. Tilden, in his letter of acceptance, offers what he means to say are two remedies. For the first he says:

What you want to do now is to cut down your expenses and live within your income. I would give all the legerdemain of finance and financiering, I would give the whole of it for the old home maxim "live within your income."

This follows from his theory that existing evils grow out of "excessive governmental consumption," for he directs his advice to cutting down the expenses of the National Government and perhaps to individual expenses as well. This is good advice. It may be found on inspired pages, and it was taught by Franklin a century ago.

But so far as individual economy is concerned, it can be practiced without having a democratic President. So far as economy in national public expenditures is concerned I have already shown that the republican party has been constantly reducing expenses and taxes, and that democratic success would add to the national burdens hundreds, if not thousands, of millions, by the allowance of southern war claims, to be followed probably by pensions for rebel soldiers, if not payment ultimately for emancipated slaves.

TILDEN FOR CONTRACTION.

The democratic party now of course stand by its platform and candidate for the Presidency in 1876. Here, then, is its purpose.

Mr. Tilden's second remedy referring to the greenbacks says there is a surplus of them, and that they should be funded into interest-bearing bonds. His letter of acceptance says:

With respect to whatever surplus of legal-tenders the wants of business may fail to keep in use, and on which, in order to save interest, will be returned for redemption, they can be paid or they can be funded.

In the convention which nominated Tilden, General Ewing, of Ohio, discussing the platform adopted, says:

It commits us to the reduction of the legal-tender money.

In 1875 the democratic party of Ohio and Indiana demanded "more greenbacks." They sounded the alarm that contraction "has brought disaster to the business of the country and threatens it with general bankruptcy and ruin."

In 1876 they supported Tilden, who says there is a surplus of greenbacks which should be funded. This, on a large scale, would bring contraction "with a vengeance," and indeed prostrate our industries. No man who honestly supported the Ohio democratic platform of 1875 can support the policy of Tilden or the democratic party now.

He proposes no increase of greenbacks, no increase of currency, no abandonment of the policy of resumption. This is the feast to which the democratic party now invites Allen and the inflation anti-resumption democrats of Ohio.

THE TRUE PLAN OF RESUMPTION.

The democratic and republican parties agree now that resumption is desirable at some time. There are differences of opinion as to the time when it can commence and the means to accomplish it.

If the Government shall, as Tilden proposes, fund all or a large part of the greenbacks, resumption on the residue can come speedily. It will not be difficult to resume when there is but little currency on which to resume. But this means a contraction of greenbacks which will be ruinous to business. It means to strike down half our currency and wipe it out of existence. Then the burden of resumption will be thrown on the national banks. There is not sufficient coin in the country, and the banks own but little of what there is. They cannot and will not incur the cost of buying coin abroad, and they will be compelled to surrender their circulation to escape the burden of resumption, if all thrown on them by funding all the greenbacks. This will wipe out alike greenbacks and bank-notes and bring ruin to business, which no words can describe. This is the feast to which the Tilden democracy invites us. It is the programme of destroying the national banks advocated in the Ohio democratic platform of 1875, and in other States as well. It is the latent purpose of the democratic party, not openly avowed in the national platform. The republican party is conservative and watchful of the business interests of the country. It will commit no such folly or wickedness as this.

As to the time and means for resumption, I can only speak for myself. On the 24th of February, 1876, "the actual available coin owned by the Government" was only $13,341,423.76. (House Executive Document No. 133, first session Forty-fourth Congress.) It is no more now.

There should be no such reduction of the volume of money as to disturb business, reduce prices, or embarrass debtors. The greenbacks should be redeemable in coin so soon as the requisite coin can be accumulated in the Treasury. If the public demand for coin should cause the greenbacks all to be redeemed, their place would be supplied with the coin, and there would be no reduction of the volume of money. Coin dollars would be money—more money than paper dollars. In fact, $160,000,000 of gold now in the country, and now a marketable commodity, would become current money, and increase the supply of circulating money. Resumption would increase the money. The supply of coin thus produced would exceed the volume of bank-notes, and enable the banks to maintain resumption without reducing their circulation. It may not require a supply of coin equal to the greenback circulation, $369,772,284, to begin and maintain resumption. Considerably less may possibly answer the purpose. But we should not underestimate the difficulties of resumption. The first difficulty to be encountered is the propensity of the people to hoard money. It is probable that the demand for this, and for banks and business purposes, would require $300,000,000 within a year after resumption begins. Our paper circulation was in July, 1876, $737,217,215. Of this the banks hold about $120,000,000, the Treasury about $12,000,000, and private banks about $25,000,000, or in all $157,000,000. The residue of our currency, $580,217,215, is invisible. It is in State, county, city, village, and township treasuries, in the safes of business men and corporations, but more largely than all, it is hoarded by the people to the amount of probably $250,000,000 or more. Resumption must first satisfy the demand for this purpose, and the Treasury cannot make redemption permanent with a less sum than is sufficient to meet it. Even the fractional silver recently issued, though less valuable than greenbacks, is hoarded, and is rarely visible, threatening a scarcity of change. The time when this (or whatever may be a sufficient) sum can be accumulated in the Treasury will in all probability, as it seems to me, fix the date of resumption.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, in the discussions in Congress in 1874, has shown that the nine great banks of Europe hold $600,000,000 of coin; that they will probably not permit it to go abroad; that they resisted the refunding of our 6 per cent. national bonds until the Treasury Department would agree only to convert 6 per cents, already held in Europe, into 5 per cents, and that they were so sensitive to any export of coin that the Geneva award of $15,500,000, payable in gold, was in fact paid in our own Government bonds. It is quite probable that we cannot rely on buying coin from Europe with our bonds. And if we could it is by no means certain that it is desirable to add to our interest-bearing national debt even to accomplish the desirable resumption. Coin can be accumulated in the Treasury from our coin revenues. This will require time; how much, no man can tell. While the process goes on, our paper will gradually improve in value. The republican platform of 1876 therefore commits the party to no absolute day. This was proposed in the national convention, but voted down. The platform demands resumption "at the earliest practicable period," and "a continuous and steady progress to specie payment." This is judicious, practicable, and wise. Recently the coin supply in Europe has largely accumulated, and the same conditions possibly do not now exist as in 1874. The balance of trade now turning in our favor may materially aid resumption.

REPUBLICANS CAN MANAGE CURRENCY—DEMOCRATS NOT.

The republican party can be trusted; the democratic party, not.

During the long years of democratic rule the country never had a sound paper currency. Expansions, contractions, panics, bankruptcy, uncertainty, ruin, followed the democratic party in its career of misrule, its subserviency to slavery, and its imbecility for any good purpose.

In the "Sixth Annual Review of the Commerce, Manufactures, and the Public and Private Improvements of Chicago for 1857," it is said:

Till the 12th of last September, for nearly four years past, the range for exchange on New York has been three-quarters of 1 per cent., the variation being from ¼ to 1¼ per cent. premium. As most of our readers have had occasion to feel, since September the price has been ruinously high; but such has been the determination of our mercantile community to maintain their honor unt'arnished that enormous sacrifices have been cheerfully made to meet maturing obligations. Ten per cent. has been the highest price charged by the regular bankers; but for many days during the last three months they have had none to sell even at these figures. Twelve and even 15 per cent. has been paid by parties to the brokers for small amounts rather than have notes protested. These enormous prices for exchange have cost our city an immense amount of money; but as a whole there can be no doubt that it has been a great and positive advantage to our trade to do it. It was caused by the impossibility of converting the bills of the Illinois and Wisconsin banks into coin. For a time no one dared to keep an account in Saint Louis, for nearly all the banks and bankers failed, or were considered in a most precarious condition.

This is the history of one year in one locality in the days of democratic power, policy, and ascendency. It is a fair sample of nearly all localities during too large a portion of the years of democratic rule.

The democratic party went out of power on the 4th of March, 1861, with a bank-note circulation of only $207,102,477.

The democratic rebellion came, requiring $2,000,000 a day for the use of the Government and a vast increase for the business of the country. The republican party was equal to the emergency. It gave to the country the greenbacks, the fractional currency, the national-bank notes—the best currency not immediately convertible into coin which the world ever saw. The greenbacks were kept good by the faith the people had in the republican party, by the solemn promise in the law under which they were issued that no more than $400,000,000 should ever be issued, and by the promise of ultimate payment in coin. The democratic party opposed all this without offering a better or any system of currency. The coin in the country would not pay the expenses of the war for a day.

Mr. Pendleton, speaking the democratic sentiment in Congress on the 29th January, 1862, more than doubted the constitutional power to issue greenbacks, and said:

You send these notes out into the world stamped with irredeemability. You put on them the mark of Cain, and like Cain they will go forth to be vagabonds and fugitives on the earth.

He was a false prophet, speaking to defeat the means of suppressing the rebellion. The greenbacks went out with the stamp of patriotism on them, they were baptized in the blood of our soldiers, they and the national banks performed the financial part of saving the life of the Republic; and the democratic party, not the greenback, became the political vagabond and wanderer!

The republican party, which managed our currency so well in war, can be trusted in peace.

Our greenback and national-bank notes are good, but our national platform of 1876 affirms it is our duty and our policy to make them better, to perform the promise of making them equal to coin "as soon as practicable."

If it can be done as the so-called resumption act of January 14, 1875, proposes, by January 1, 1879, it will be done; if not, the time will be postponed. This act is evidence of a purpose which at some time is to be carried into effect. Like faith, it is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

DEMOCRATIC POLICY ON THE CURRENCY A FRAUD.

The democratic party cannot be trusted to manage our currency, because of its incapacity heretofore, in peace and in war, because its national platform of 1876 is a double-dealing fraud intended to deceive, because it has no settled policy, but has been against greenbacks when needed in war, and for their inflation without necessity in peace, in violation of the pledge of Congress and of the Constitution, and because a democratic House of Representatives, after eight months' trial, on the 6th of August, 1876, confessed utter incapacity to deal with the currency problem, as I will proceed to show:

I. I have already shown the incapacity of the democratic party through its whole history to deal with the subject of currency alike in peace and in war.

II. The democratic platform of 1876 is a double-dealing fraud. It contains three principal declarations on the subject of currency.

1. It demands resumption "soon"—that is the word, "soon." This is intended to satisfy the creditor States of the East.

2. It says: "We denounce the failure for all these eleven years to make good the promise" of resumption.

This is intended to satisfy the East. Its complaint is that the republican party should have resumed long years ago—a claim never before made, an impossibility, and an absurdity.

During "all these eleven years" no democrat ever proposed a plan which could have brought resumption. In and out of Congress the party opposed every practicable measure looking to that object. The Ohio democratic platform of 1875, on the subject of resumption, demanded "that this policy be abandoned;" and the party in other States followed the same political faith.

3. The national platform denounces "the resumption clause of the act of 1875" as a "hinderance" to "a speedy return to speie payments."

Here is a clause intended to read for speedy resumption in the East—resumption earlier than January, 1879, for the act of 1875 can only be a "hinderance," because it will "delay" resumption. It is intended to be read in the West as favoring a postponement of resumption away beyond 1879. When the platform was read in the Saint Louis convention, which adopted it, General Ewing, of Ohio, exposed its true character by saying:

It denounces one clause only of the specie resumption law, the clause fixing the time for the resumption of specie payment, leaving the rest of the act to stand unobjected to, and by implication approved. But why does it object to the clause? Because it is destroying the business of the country, in connection with the balance of the law? Not at all, but merely because it is a hinderance to specie payment. The fair inference being at any rate—if not a fair one, an inference that will surely be drawn—that the objections of the national democratic party to the specie-resumption law are confined only to the date for resumption, and the objection to that is, that that date is a "hinderance" to resumption, and the construction will be given, and with some degree of plausibility at least, that the democratic party want resumption earlier than the date fixed. [Applause.]

III. The democratic party has no settled policy. During the war when greenbacks were a necessity the democratic party opposed them in the interest of rebellion. The Ohio democratic platform of 1875, as did the democratic platforms in other States, demanded a new issue of greenbacks in undefined quantities. This was alike a violation of the pledge in the law authorizing their issue, which limits the amount to $400,000,000, and in time of peace a violation of the Constitution. The national platform of 1876 repudiates the idea of more greenbacks; and Tilden says there is a surplus and says they should be funded. The Ohio democrats in 1875 demanded inflation; in 1876 they supported Tilden who favored contraction.

In 1875 the Ohio democrats opposed resumption; in 1876 they supported a platform which demanded it "soon." In 1875 they demanded the destruction of the national banks; in 1876 they stood on a platform which is silent as to banks, but of which General Ewing said in the convention:

It commits us to the perpetuation of the national-bank system.

The truth is the democratic party is hopelessly divided, is without unity of purpose or sentiment, and if in power could agree on nothing, but would introduce that most disturbing and dangerous element, ruinous to all business, uncertainty. If we can judge the party by its conflicting professions and platforms, we might well say:

It wires in and wires out
And leaves the people still in doubt,
Whether the snake that made the track
Is going south or coming back.

IV. This democratic House of Representatives has confessed utter inability to deal with the subject of currency.

In 1874 the people were outraged by the unfortunate "salary-grab law," wrong as it was in every respect, and for which democrats were more responsible than republicans.

They were outraged by the "Credit Mobilier" frauds, so recently exposed in Congress, and they elected a democratic House of Representatives. The democratic party East had denounced the resumption act as "a policy without a plan," and in the West they had denounced the policy because it had an operative plan—the only plan that can succeed—to accumulate coin in the Treasury as soon as practicable sufficient to resume.

The act of February 25, 1862, requires duties on imported goods to "be paid in coin," and this is the source of the coin supply.

This democratic House first met in December, 1875, and during a session of eight and a half months, had ample time to develop every democratic plan upon every subject. And now near the close of its second session, after a trial of two years, it has not presented or agreed upon one measure designed to protect civil or political rights, to improve the revenue system, the management of the national debt, the currency, civil service reform, or in any respect to promote the material or moral interests of the people. Week after week an expectant people awaited with anxiety some measure upon some subject that would be useful for some purpose, and especially upon the currency, with a view to remedy "hard times."

The mountains labored, and after eight months of the first session of democratic rule in Congress, was born—"ridiculus mus"—a confession that a democratic House were incapable of understanding the subject. They asked for experts to aid them. Experts are people who understand their business, as a democratic Congress cannot.

On the 31st July, 1876, Mr. Cox introduced a joint resolution in these words:

Resolved, &c., That a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress be appointed who may call to their aid three or more experts in finance; three of said committee to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and the same number by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and report at the next session of Congress upon the practicability, desirability, and mode of remonetizing silver upon the resumption of specie payments and upon other kindred subjects of pending fiscal legislation.

This was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and with immaterial modifications, all having the same purpose, was agreed to on the 6th of August, 1876. And this is the consummation of democratic wisdom on the subject of currency. The democratic party may now sing:

This is the way we long have sought
And mourned because we found it not.

And up to this hour absolutely nothing has been done to relieve the pressure of "hard times." This democratic House has been weighed in the balances and found wanting. It has been worse than a barren fig tree, and should receive its reward accordingly.

THE GREENBACK PARTY.

In some portions of the country there is a so-called "greenback party." Their platform in 1876 was substantially that advocated by the democrats of Ohio in 1875. It rests on three essential declared purposes—(1) the withdrawal from the national banks of the power to issue notes, which means their destruction; (2) the repeal of the resumption act, and (3) the issue of unlimited amounts of greenbacks by the Government, never redeemable in coin, but a legal tender for all purposes, and convertible into a bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, payable in the new greenbacks; and the bonds themselves never to be payable in coin but re-convertible back into the new greenbacks—the one convertible into the other but neither ever payable in anything. Democrats who supported Allen and Carey in Ohio in 1875, cannot support the democratic party now and preserve consistency or self-respect. But republicans who supported Rutherford B. Hayes for governor of Ohio in 1875, and for President in 1876, and all men who desire permanent prosperity should support the republican party now.

It may be proper to consider briefly the principles of the greenback party.

The destruction of the national banks is objectionable for several reasons, some of which I will state rather than argue:

1 It would violate public faith. The banks were created under a law which gives them banking privileges for twenty years. There is indeed a power of repeal, but repeal without cause would be unjust. Capital invested on the faith of a law should not be disturbed.

2. They furnish the best currency the people ever had. It is of uniform value all over the country and is safe beyond doubt, because for every $90 in bank notes the Treasury holds $100 in Government bonds, worth $112 in gold.

3. The destruction of the banks would require the collection of $1,000,000,000 which the people owe them. This would produce embarrassment and ruin by forcing debtors to pay. Those who owe the banks would in turn require their debtors to pay. Money now embarked in buying farm products, operating factories, and aiding other industries would be withdrawn; laborers would be thrown out of employment and panic and hard times would come in earnest.

4. The national banks pay more taxes than any other property. They are taxed by the National Government and the States. In 1875 they paid into the National Treasury $7,268,379.16 and probably into the county treasuries in all the States $12,000,000. If the banks are abolished this tax must be raised from other sources.

5. The experience of all commercial nations is that banks are an absolute necessity, and the national-banking system is the best ever devised. But I will not enlarge upon these propositions. The repeal of the resumption act in full, and all its parts, and the issue of such notes as I have described, is a part of one policy to have a Government currency never redeemable in coin or anything of value. I will content myself with enumerating a few of the objections to this wild, impracticable, humbug scheme of irredeemable notes.

(1) Under the Constitution they could not be made a legal tender in payment of pre-existing debts. The Constitution declares that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." The Supreme Court only sustained the legal-tender character of greenbacks by a vote of 5 to 4, and two at least of the five judges only sustained them as a war necessity, justifying this mode of borrowing money. But new Treasury notes now would encounter the objection that there is no war necessity, and as nothing is "money" but gold or silver coin, they not promising to pay "dollars," which means coin dollars, as our greenbacks do, would be declared unconstitutional as a legal tender. Notes that will not pay debts can have but little value.

(2) It would be a fraudulent violation of the pledge made in the act of June 30, 1864, that no more than $400,000,000 of greenbacks should be issued. A nation that would break its promises can never be trusted.

(3) The new greenbacks would rapidly depreciate in value. If they were convertible into a bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest and payable in coin, the bond and the new greenbacks would even now be only worth about seventy cents on the dollar, for 4½ per cent. bonds are only worth par. But bonds payable only in new greenbacks, which themselves are never redeemable in coin but only convertible back into bonds, would be of no value abroad and could not maintain value at home. The paper money of many countries, even payable in coin, has become worthless by its excessive issues. This would be liable to the same excessive issues, and would be worthless because making no promise to pay anything of intrinsic value. Such depreciated currency would swindle all creditors and fall largely on the laboring-men. The wages due them is $120,000,000. They have deposits in savings-banks of $760,000,000; in trust companies and other banks, $200,000,000, and have other moneys due, $130,000,000. They should be paid in money having full value. From the time when Abraham purchased a burial-place for Sarah, his wife, with coin the precious metals have been the money of the world. All efforts to give value to a currency not payable in coin have failed.

(4) This scheme would be ruinous to debtors. Creditors would sue and force collections while currency had some value, and not wait till depreciation had robbed them of all their dues.

Suppose it shall be determined that there shall be inflation. What then?

Will men loan money to those who are in debt, with a prospect of payment in a still more depreciated currency?

Will creditors indulge debtors when delay may bring payment in a still more depreciated currency?

This will close the avenues of the debtor class, either to indulgence or to money, and they must fall a victim to judgments, executions, forced sale of property at terrible sacrifices, ending in bankruptcy and ruin. Of all men in the community, the debtor class, who need indulgence from creditors or hope to borrow, will be most ruinously affected by inflation.

(5) It would discourage all industrial enterprises. It would prevent the building of new factories, houses, railroads, &c., and thus take away the means of employment. Men will not embark in new enterprises on inflated prices, because those prices cannot continue always, and when prices go down they cannot be made to pay. Men will say: "We will wait until we know what is coming before we will build." Uncertainty is ruin to business.

Will inflation build new railroads, or open new mines, or revive manufactures? This might be so for a time in starting from a specie basis. It was so, because it was possible to go in debt to a certain limit. But many railroads already built on inflated prices do not pay, and men will not embark in new projects on greatly increased prices with a certainty that even now they could not be made to pay, and much less when we return, as we must, to real money and substantial prices.

Men will not build new factories or houses at an inflated cost with a certainty that when normal conditions come, as come they must, their value must shrink and yield inadequate rents or profits on the original cost. Let inflation come, with the experience of the past in view, and men will say: "We will not build until we can build at less cost;" and they will act accordingly.

During the last summer one of the largest manufacturers of reapers and mowers in the world, the famous Champions, of Springfield, Ohio, in the district which I have the honor to represent, was asked if inflation would improve his business. Said he:

If inflation is to come, I would suspend business at once. I cannot afford to pay for labor and materials this year in money worth 90 cents in coin on the dollar and sell for paper next year worth only 70. This would ruin any business.

Men will only embark in enterprises giving employment to labor when there is stability in the value of money, when they can calculate the profit to come from investments. The real cause of our difficulties and the remedy have been better stated by Governor Hayes, in his letter of acceptance of July 8, 1876, than by any other statesman or political economist whose writings I have recently observed. He says:

It is my conviction that the feeling of uncertainty, inseparable from an irredeemable paper currency, with its fluctuations of value, is one of the great obstacles to a revival of confidence and business and to a return of prosperity. That uncertainty can be ended in, but one way: the resumption of specie payments; BUT THE LONGER THE INSTABILITY connected with our present money system is permitted to continue the greater will be the injury inflicted upon our economical interests.

These are words of wisdom, the words of an able statesman.

Millions of capital are now locked up awaiting a solution of our financial troubles. The success of the democratic party would bring uncertainty, the success of the republican party stability. If it shall be supported in Congress and maintained in power it will restore confidence, bring the gradual resumption of specie payments, and revive our prostrate industries all over the land.

(6) Inflation would impose burdens on consumers. It would tax every consumer and buyer of manufactures. It would tax every manufacture. The business of the country deals in thousands of millions of chattel property besides land. A change of 10 per cent. in the value of the currency affects the holders of property who are in debt hundreds of millions. With a currency of changeable value dealers must add on to sales from 2 to 5 per cent. to indemnify them for loss in the depreciation of currency. This falls on manufacturers and consumers, and, with great inflation, would put an end to many branches of industry and throw men out of employment.

Suppose the manufacturer of iron should be confronted with a law or a practice which would make a ton of iron consist of 1,800 pounds or 2,000 pounds, or any fluctuating point between them, dependent on the gamblers in Wall street and the click of the telegraph. If he took a contract to furnish iron a month hence he would naturally say a ton now is 1,800 pounds, but in a month it may be 1,900 pounds. I must deduct from the price of labor 5 per cent. of the value I could afford to pay if I knew exactly what a ton would be, to indemnify me against the risk I incur. If I cannot do this I must cease operations and leave the field to iron-makers in other countries where a ton is a fixed measure.

If a yard measure should vary, the manufacturers of cloth would reason in the same way, and the manufacturers of corn whisky would learn the same logic if a barrel could fluctuate between thirty-two and forty gallons.

These measures do not indeed fluctuate, but there is another measure more universally in use which does.

Coin is a medium of exchange. It measures values. It is unvarying. It is recognized the world over. It is the money of the world.

We have a paper currency by which we effect exchanges and measure future liabilities.

The manufacturer of iron, or wool, or cotton, or wood, who agrees to furnish a given quantity of goods for $1,000, at a fixed time, knows he is to receive $1,000 in currency, but he does not know whether it will be worth $840 or $900 in gold. He is uncertain what he will get. He must indemnify himself against loss by a charge upon labor. He will not enlarge his business nor embark in more enterprises while this uncertainty lasts.

A fluctuating currency is a tax on labor, the only real source of wealth. Additional inflation will increase the disparity between gold and paper and add to the tax.

Inflation proposes to pay the laborer in a currency which may be worth sixty or ninety cents on the dollar.

Justice demands that we gradually approach resumption, so that when a dollar is paid for labor it shall be equal to coin.

The approach to resumption will remedy the evils which have grown out of inflation. It will turn the balance of trade in our favor and enable us to accumulate a supply of the long-banished gold. It will revive our industries and give employment and profit to our people. The balance of trade has already turned in our favor. Our exports for 1876 were $32,674,647 more than for 1875, and our imports for the year ending June 30, 1876, were $72,918,159 less than for 1875. The total excess of exports of merchandise exclusive of specie over imports during the last fiscal year was about $79,000,000. (Congressional Record, August 10, 1876.)

The Commercial and Financial Chronicle of February 10 gives the following exhibit:

*The figures given for the twelve months in each case represent the specie value.

The industries of the country are reviving. Even the iron industry, so much depressed, is better now than ever under democratic rule. The Philadelphia Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association for February, 1877, says:

Our consumption of manufactured iron in 1875, except rails, greatly exceeded that of 1871 or 1872, and only falls below that of 1873 and 1874 in our whole history; while our consumption of steel never was so great as in 1875 and 1876.

(7) This inflation scheme would give Congress the dangerous power to fix the value of every man's property, and change it often largely and speedily. Speculators would besiege Congress for inflation. Then, when people are in debt they would demand contraction. Alternate expansions and contractions would enable shrewd speculators to gobble up the capital of the country. The uncertainty would paralyze all business.

The currency of a country should be regulated by the wants of trade, and under resumption it will be so.

(8) A new issue of Treasury notes would not relieve debtors. Suppose you issue a hundred or five hundred millions of greenbacks. You will not distribute them gratis, either to debtors or borrowers. They can only get them by giving something of value in exchange for them.

(9) It would bring violent expansions and contractions. In times of apparent prosperity bonds would be converted into circulating notes and enormously inflate the currency. With the slightest panic the notes would go back into bonds, producing speedy, immense, and ruinous contraction. This is the most splendid contrivance to produce violent expansions and contractions ever devised.

I have described only the one question of "hard times," the cause and the remedy.

But upon all questions the republican party is the only one that can safely be trusted. The great questions of the times have been discussed by others.

Let us keep the ship of state in the control of a President and a party that believes we have a nation capable of preserving its own existence, and that duty and patriotism demand that men, regardless of race or color, shall be protected in the enjoyment of equal civil and political rights all over the land. This is the grand mission of the republican party.

The following table will show the increase in exports of agricultural exports, and illustrate the policy of our legislation, surrounded, as it has been, with so many difficulties and disadvantageous circumstances:

An Exposure of Democratic Frauds at the Late Election in South Carolina, and a Vindication of the Republicans.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. RAINEY,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21 1877,

On the recent election in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, in one form or another the condition of the South has commanded the attention of the country from the very foundation of this Government to the present time, and I am confident it will continue to do so, either to the detriment or benefit of that section, during many years hence. This must necessarily be so because of the diversity of sentiment and the habits of the ruling classes, and because, likewise, of a deficiency of that lofty patriotism which ought to control the emotions and shape the sentiments of those who should love their entire country better than a portion, only, thereof. The struggle of later years was for the perpetuity of slavery; a struggle entered into under the conviction that this peculiar institution was sanctioned by Holy Writ, and that consequently its maintenance at any cost would meet the appproval of God himself. To such an end, and thus animated, no means were spared in forcing conviction and molding public sentiment into thorough acquiescence with these pronounced ideas. The warmth and earnestness thrown into the efforts here noted, however sincere the convictions of which they were the offspring, proved fatal in effect. They shook the entire fabric of the Republic, supplanted peace with discord, and, annihilating the country's wide-spread harmony, severed that fraternal relation which is so essential to the stability of a good and wholesome government.

In my judgment, the difference of opinion regarding this great southern question is owing very largely to the want of a full understanding of the facts relating thereto, and a public tendency to discredit, as partisan, all attempted explanations of the true condition of affairs among the late insurrectionary States. The original objective point in this respect was the negro—as a slave; and to-day the real bone of contention among the Carolinas and their sister States is this same identical negro—no longer a slave but as a freeman and a citizen. The great question among them at present is the one absorbing interrogatory: Has the colored man, in acquiring freedom, acquired also the rights and privileges incidental to that condition; or, has he still to render obedience to the control and dictation of the dominant race? Reduced yet more simply the question with which the white people of the South are now wrestling is this: Has the negro become possessed of nominal or actual freedom? And while upon this branch of my subject I wish to express the belief that they have not, generally speaking, opposed the enfranchisement of my race except in so far as it invaded their cherished theory; a theory in which each succeeding generation had been taught to believe as something perfectly proper because, as was supposed, sanctioned by Scripture. And even this theoretical objection to enfranchisement would fade away like mist before the morning sun if we would but consent to become docile to dictation from our former masters as to whom we should support and what measures we should sustain; in other words, if we agreed to hold our individual ballots subject to the disposition of the southern rulers. In such a case all trouble would cease and the South become, almost immediately, strangely tranquilized. But such surrender would be the sacrifice of the spirit of true manhood to the Moloch, slavery—an institution which has made of the South a perfect pandemonium for any one who would dare denounce it in its very cradle before its very patrons.

And now, sir, let me claim your attention and the attention of this House and the country while I touch upon the subject of intimidation, an offense charged upon the republican party in South Carolina during the late State and presidential elections.

Before entering specifically into a discussion of this topic I wish to make one general observation relating thereto. The opposition arraigns us for intimidation of voters, not alone at the last election in South Carolina but during many preceding contests. Of course it is colored voters to whom the charge relates, they comprising a large majority of the voting population of the State, and holding, therefore, the supremacy. This distinction being acknowledged—and it cannot well stand denial—I would ask of the people at large one simple question. It is not addressed to the democracy of the country, because the democracy is perfectly sensible of its wide deviation from truth in accusing republicans at the South of practices of intimidation during election times. Democrats know full well the utter falsity of its charge, but persist in reiterating the same merely for partisan effect.

I ask the people of the country at large this question, therefore, and them alone: The republican party having compassed the freedom and subsequent enfranchisement of the colored race, and thus created in several southern States a clear voting majority, in what political party, then, is it most likely that intimidation will be found, if found at all? With what political party will this new element be found coalescing voluntarily and impelled by naught save gratitude at the outset and gratitude and principle afterward? On the other hand, what political party, dismayed and enraged at this picture of colored men, freed and enfranchised, arrayed against it, will be found resorting, during State and presidential campaigns, to practices of intimidation? Sir, I pause for a reply.

Returning now to the more specific consideration of this same theme, it may be noted that one great alleged factor in the so-called work of republican intimidation was the presence at and near the polls, during the last election in South Carolina, of United States soldiers. We are accused of procuring the presence, then and there, of armed men, the mere sight of whom, it is now said, proved sufficient to overawe and terrify would-be democratic voters. Sir, how unfortunate it is that the trumpeters of these declarations are possessed of memories so deficient as to cause them to forget the language of the democratic press in South Carolina on this very subject. The News and Courier of Charleston is the recognized organ of democracy in the Palmetto State. Prior to the 7th of November last it referred time and again to the proposed concentration of troops in the State during the period of election, and professed, in all apparent earnestness, to welcome heartily such a move on the part of the Government, declaring, in effect, that such action would be hailed with delight by the democrats as assuredly proving instrumental in augmenting considerably the party vote. Whether these editorial assurances were intended as mere democratic bombast or real party sentiment it is not for me to say, but in this reference we accord to the great party of reform the latter charitable supposition.

In doing so, however, yet another obstacle to clear reasoning in the premises presents itself: How were the United States soldiers to assist in augmenting considerably the democratic vote in the State; or, indeed, the republican vote either? Was their presence at the polls to exert a moral or physical influence over the balloting? We of the republican party know that United States soldiers were sent into the Southern States to preserve the peace—this alone. But assuming for the moment that they were dispatched to these sections (as some would there have it) to overawe and terrify, how were the democrats to derive benefit therefrom? And yet such seemingly were the views of the southern democracy on this question before the election, as expounded in the party organ. Now, however, the struggle ended, and South Carolina conceded to be republican by all honest-thinking men, the entire retrospect is changed. Soldiers, we are told, served as intimidators all through the State, and terrified democrats were forced at the bayonet's point to vote for Chamberlain and Hayes.

Ah, sir! right here we cannot but note the brilliant consistency which marks the political conduct of southern democrats. Had the State by unaccountable means really gone democratic we should have heard nothing of this flippant talk against the soldiers. The predictions of the newspaper—in effect already quoted—would have been declared to have been realized. In the absence of such declaration and in this subsequent talk of intimidation in the State can we find an indirect democratic concession of a republican victory in South Carolina in November last.

And the opposition—was it entirely innocent of the guilt of "intimidation," with which it essays to bespatter so liberally its powerful party enemy? Again have we only to turn to the News and Courier of Charleston for an indirect negative answer to this question.

I am well aware of and fully appreciate the great doctrine of our republican form of government, namely, that the military must be subordinate to the civil power, especially in times of peace. I know how deeply rooted this principle is in the hearts of the American people and how justly and properly they boast of this distinguishing feature of its fundamental law. But there are other principles of still greater importance and more essential to the perpetuity of our Government, and these are: that the citizens should enjoy their personal liberty and exercise fully and freely their political rights. This, Mr. Speaker, I regard as the first and most important duty of any government, without which no government is worth perpetuation. The framers of the Constitution comprehended the importance of this protection and provided for its exercise under certain conditions. These conditions existed in South Carolina, and the President, having been called upon by the executive of the State in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution placed the military forces of the Government in the State for the protection of life and liberty in the exercise of political rights.

The only question, it seems to me, that can properly engage our attention is this: Did the circumstances justify the action of the President in sending the troops to South Carolina? I answer the question in the affirmative, and will now proceed to state some of the reasons why I am of that opinion. There was a riot at Hamburgh last summer which has become known far and wide; the cold-blooded atrocity in shooting unarmed prisoners has awakened a just feeling of horror and indignation in every manly breast. That riot was looked upon in South Carolina by those who understood the true condition of the State as being of great political significance, on account of the time at which it occurred and the parties engaged in it, especially those controlling the affair. That riot was the key-note of the campaign. There were several political meetings held soon afterward by the republicans of Edgefield, Newberry, Abbeville, and Barnwell Counties whereat the governor of the State addressed the people on the political topics of the day. At these meetings there were large organized bodies of white democratic citizens, fully armed, who participated in, and in some cases took absolute possession of, the affair, and who by their violent harangues and threatening demonstrations plainly indicated that they intended to overawe and intimidate the republican citizens in the exercise of their political rights. These facts are notorious. It was this state of things that induced the governor to call upon President Grant for that protection to which every citizen of the Republic is justly entitled under the Constitution. The call was promptly responded to and troops were sent simply to preserve the peace between the contending political factions, and this was all they ever did.

I have scarcely patience to answer the charges that the presence of the troops prevented any democratic voter, or any voter at all, from voting. The charge is too absurd for serious consideration, much less refutation. Not the slightest evidence has been or can be adduced which is competent to prove such a ridiculous allegation. I cannot conceive of any one really and sincerely believing such a thing. I can and do understand politicians whose heated imaginations have been frenzied by defeat asserting such things upon insufficient proof and under such delusions who in their calmer moments would with contempt disregard all such allegations. I am perfectly well aware that the presence of troops with the well-known instructions given them exercised a great moral influence in South Carolina in preventing the democrats in that State from executing fully and effectively their carefully prepared plans for intimidating republican voters. This, I am sure, greatly exasperated them.

Let me describe, Mr. Speaker, a meeting which I myself attended in my own congressional district, which illustrates my argument better than any general description can do. I was appointed to speak at Bennettsville, in Marlboro County. I had to ride fourteen miles from the town of Cheraw, where I had spoken the previous day. As we rode along a number of republicans joined us in the road and informed us that they expected trouble, as the democrats had been boasting for some days that they would break up the republican meeting. As we drove into town, followed by about fifty or sixty of our republican friends on horseback, we met at the corner of a street at right angles to the one we were on a long line of mounted and armed democrats, numbering several hundred, who had gathered from the adjacent counties as well as from the one they were in, while some had come even from the State of North Carolina, (as I was reliably informed,) which bounded this county in one direction. There was imminent danger of a conflict, but fortunately, before any difficulty occurred, both parties saw a company of United States soldiers at a short distance marching in from the station, located fourteen miles away, and which they had left early that morning. The timely presence of these soldiers undoubtedly averted bloodshed, and thus deterred the democrats from attacking the republicans. I considered it at the time, and so declare now, that the presence of the troops was most providential. I am confident that members of both parties who are alive at this time, if it had been otherwise, would have been numbered among the dead.

After this excitement had subsided we held our meeting in quietness and peace while the democrats dispersed.

Mr. Speaker, the republicans of the South ask for peace, and with that peace their political rights. This is a part of my own political experience. They are facts which I can vouch for from personal knowledge.

But perhaps one of the best arguments to show the wisdom of the governor of the State in calling for troops, and of the President in heeding that call, is to be found in the conduct of the citizens of Charleston County. It is a matter of common notoriety that Judge A. G. Magrath and General W. G. De Saussure, two of the most respectable and influential democratic citizens of Charleston, waited upon General Ruger and requested that troops should be sent over to James Island for the protection of the white democrats in that part of the county, and that they also waited on Governor Chamberlain and requested him to second their efforts, which was done. On this island, and others upon the sea-coast in Charleston County, the colored citizens, who are almost invariably republicans, outnumber the whites, who are almost all democrats, about ten to one. These colored people had been goaded to desperation by the persecutions they had undergone and had at last turned upon their oppressors and threatened retaliation, and in several cases, notably at Cainhoy, defended themselves when attacked, driving their assailants before them. As soon as the democrats saw that the republicans were determined on self-defense when driven to extremity, conscious of having repeatedly trampled upon their rights and feeling themselves worthy of severe punishment, they themselves applied for protection and would have been only too glad to have had the presence of United States troops to shield them from the pending wrath and vengeance of those whom they had so long and wantonly maltreated.

I could continue to multiply these facts indefinitely, both from my own experience and from the testimony taken by the committees of the Senate and House, but I have said enough, I trust, to warrant and justify the action of the Executive in ordering soldiers into South Carolina.

In order that it might be seen that I have not drawn upon my imagination for the foregoing statement, I invite attention to the following bits of testimony taken before the House committee. Having a personal acquaintance with the witness, I am enabled to vouch for its truthfulness:

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, December 26, 1876.

PARIS SIMPKINS (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. At Edgefield Court-House. I was born and raised in Abbeville. I am twenty-seven years old.

Q. What offices, if any, have you held?

A. I have represented that county twice in the General Assembly of this State, the lower house.

Q. Were you a candidate for re-election at the last election, on the 7th of November?

A. With the consent of the committee I will read a statement that I would like to make, and afterwards, if they choose to ask any questions, they can do so.

Q. Who prepared it?

A. I prepared it from what transpired under my own observation.

The witness read the statement, as follows:

I am a resident of Edgefield County; have lived there all my life. I have represented that county twice in the Legislature of this State; was a candidate for re-election at the last general election which was held on the 7th day of November. I was at the polls on election day for the purpose of voting the republican ticket, but did not have the privilege of doing so. The polls at Edgefield Court House, where I was, Nos. 1 and 2, were blocked, and otherwise crowded by armed democrats, who were uniformed in red shirts, and from one to two pistols buckled on the outside, and some with sixteen-shooters strapped to their sides, the major part of them being mounted on horses, and using threats of a violent nature toward republicans who would present themselves for the purpose of voting the republican ticket. After witnessing for several hours the violent and formidable demonstration of the democrats to overawe and deter republican voters, and knowing, as I did, that my life had been previously threatened by the democrats for political reasons, I came to the conclusion that if I voted the republican ticket I would be murdered. I know the fact that at least six or eight hundred republicans at Edgefield Court House, who were at the polls for the purpose of voting the republican ticket, were prevented from doing so. I am quite sure if they had wanted to vote the democratic ticket, they could have done so with perfect safety. I know I could have voted the democratic ticket with perfect ease if I had so desired it. I saw a large number of republicans make several efforts to vote during the day at box No. 1, but as they would get near the polls, the democrats would immediately rush around the place of entrance and keep the republicans back. The democrats had all voted, but notwithstanding this, they stood there armed and equipped as so many sentinels placed there for the specific object of preventing republicans from voting. During the day the democrats, who were mounted, would gallop from box to box, sometimes yelling and brandishing their pistols.

At about three o'clock in the afternoon the democrats organized a democratic meeting on the court-house steps, the place of entrance to the polling-precinct No. 1, at which several candidates on the democratic ticket made speeches. This was kept up until the polls were closed; during all this time republicans made repeated efforts to vote, but were not allowed to go up the steps. I would state further, in order to show to what extent the republican leaders were intimidated by the threats and violent demonstrations of the democrats, because of their political sentiments and party fealty, that it was utterly impossible to canvass the county in the interest of the Hayes and Wheeler electors, Congressmen, or State officers. On the day of the election I saw several republicans who had been violently assaulted and beaten over the head with pistols, and severe wounds inflicted on them, because they had endeavored to vote the republican ticket. The vote of the county is largely in excess of that of any previous election. There were about 3,000 votes polled over and above what we were legally entitled to by the census which was recently taken. The majority of the census-takers of Edgefield County were democrats; that census gives the colored men a majority over the white men of 1,678. Republicans were publicly threatened with being discharged from employment, and the probability of being killed, if they persisted in giving their support to the candidates on the republican ticket.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. Do you know of any republican meeting being disturbed in that county?

A. Yes.

Q. State what you know of your own knowledge about that.

A. Some time before the election, I don't remember the date, there was a meeting advertised there as a ratification of the nomination made at Cincinnati by the republicans of Hayes and Wheeler. It was advertised that Governor Chamberlain would be there in person to speak at Edgefield Court House. There was quite a large assemblage there of republicans and democrats, and when Governor Chamberlain was escorted to the stand the stand was simultaneously mounted by General Gary and General M. C. Butler, and General Butler first addressed the meeting. I cannot remember what he said, but I know he addressed the meeting first; and I recollect he said that they proposed to be heard there, and that if they were not allowed half the time by the republicans they would not be responsible for the consequences of what might follow. General Gary also made that statement. The chairman of the meeting proceeded to introduce Governor Chamberlain to the audience as the first speaker. He was interrupted by General Gary, who told him that they did not need any chairman on that occasion, and that before any speaking was done some member of the republican party must first get up and assure the democrats that they would have a show or be permitted to speak in reply. Of course, the chairman of the meeting could not proceed any further. He had only spoken three or four words by way of introducing the governor He stopped, and conferred with Governor Chamberlain and others who were there as republicans to speak, and the governor decided that it would be better, under the circumstances, to accede to the demands of these gentlemen. Of course, the chairman of the meeting had nothing more to say, but consented to what Governor Chamberlain had said. Governor Chamberlain then got up and spoke for the republicans, and said that it had been agreed that the demands of the democrats would be conceded, or at least that time would be granted them, and that they would be allowed half an hour each. He said he would speak first for half an hour, and General Butler, I think, was to follow, McKay next, and Gary next.

Q. McKay was a republican speaker?

A. He was at that time in the interest of Governor Chamberlain.

Further comment is unnecessary.

FRAUD.

We hear a great deal, Mr. Speaker, since the election last November, about fraud. Our political opponents have repeated that charge so frequently and to such an extent that I would not be astonished if they had really become convinced that there was some truth in the allegation. But what are the real facts of the case? I shall endeavor to state them, and in doing so shall confine myself to my own State, South Carolina. The committee appointed by the House to investigate the election returns there have been compelled, by the facts themselves, to report unanimously that the republican presidential electors have been elected on the face of the returns. But the majority of that committee have endeavored to break the force of that admission by charging intimidation and fraud on the part of republicans, thereby implying that if these alleged wrongs were not practiced the democrats would have carried the State. I want it understood distinctly that upon a fair vote South Carolina is a republican State. She has always given a majority to republican candidates of about 30,000 when there have not been any internal party dissensions, and as high as 10,000 when there have been such ruptures, and, consequently, rival candidates of our own political party in the field.

The census taken by the authority of the State in 1875 gives, in round numbers, 110,000 colored voters above the age of twenty-one, and about 75,000 white voters of corresponding age.

Now, I regret to say that the color line is the party line in my State, with but comparatively few exceptions. It has been repeatedly asserted by the democrats of the State that the census was inaccurate by giving too large a population; the State census of 1875 being an increase of nearly 220,000 over the United States census of 1870. But, by taking the census of 1875 as the basis of my argument, it will be observed that the opposition get the benefit of the increase. If I were to take the United States census of 1870, my argument against them would be still more conclusive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the census of 1875 shows about 185,000 voters in the State. The returns of the election in 1876 show 183,000 votes to have been cast. I venture the assertion that such a percentage of votes was never cast before in any civilized country. Think of it: 183,000 votes cast out of 185,000 votes registered! The bare statement carries on its face the most conclusive evidence of fraud. The usual rule of proportion of votes cast to votes registered is five-sixths, and on extraordinary occasions six-sevenths, which would give in the ordinary case 154,166, and in the extraordinary case 158,591.

This, I may say, is the law gathered from election statistics; and yet instead of between 150,000 and 160,000 votes cast out of 185,000 votes registered, we have here 183,000 votes as having been cast! It is not at all surprising that our usual majority of 30,000 (in the absence of dissensions, which was the case during the last election) has been overcome. Yes, sir; I repeat it with emphasis, but calmly and deliberately. It has been extinguished by fraud and violence, but more especially by fraud. In South Carolina it has been the custom to register the names of voters in separate columns according to color. The white voters are in one column and the colored voters in another, and here I may perhaps appropriately turn for a moment to answer the allegation of fraud made against us by our opponents, who have but a slight acquaintance with the peculiarities of the people of the State in not having a registration law. They refer to the State constitution as requiring such a law, then allege that we have not passed any such measure. This charge is untrue. We have practically a registration law in existence. Each voter is required to give his name as he votes and to swear that he is entitled to vote and has not voted elsewhere at that election; and the severest penalties are attached for those who attempt to exercise the franchise unlawfully. If these precautions do not comply practically with all the substantial requirements of registration laws, then I am greatly in error. No person of any experience has ever asserted that registration laws have always prevented frauds. If those who execute the laws are determined to violate them, nothing can prevent the infraction. The special reason why a registration law in the usual form used in the Northern States has not been passed in my State is because the colored people, who form the bulk of the agricultural laborers, are accustomed to change their residence yearly and sometimes oftener, and they would by that means become deprived of their votes.

From this custom of registering the white and colored voters in separate columns at the time of the election, we are enabled to reach an almost perfectly accurate conclusion as to which party is responsible for and benefited by the unprecedented frauds perpetrated at the late election in South Carolina. I say an almost perfectly accurate conclusion, because in two out of the thirty-two counties composing the State this separate method of registration according to color was not observed, though in thirty it was. We are enabled, however, by the data furnished by the returns for the various candidates, to form a comparatively accurate conclusion with regard to the election in those two counties and therefore in the State. The total number of colored votes cast in the State at the late election, speaking in round numbers, was 97,000 out of 110,000 voters; this, as it will be observed, being a little over six-sevenths, the highest percentage known, and of which the republican candidates received 92,000 altogether, thus leaving 5,000 colored votes for the democrats, on the assumption that all the republican candidates got colored votes only, and none other, which, while not properly accurate, is substantially correct, as I have before said that the color line in my State was the party line. Now, the democrats received 91,000 votes—I should state in this comparison that I am taking the electoral vote—giving them the 5,000 colored votes that we did not get, and the entire 75,000 white votes. Assuming for the purposes of this argument that we did not get one of them, which is not correct, they would still have but 80,000 votes, and yet they got 91,000 votes, a clear fraud at first sight of 11,000 votes, and when you allow them 64,785 white votes, six-sevenths of the entire white vote, the highest percentage allowable, together with the 5,000 colored votes, it would then show a fraud of over 20,000 votes.

I think the facts here adduced, and all of which are capable of the fullest proof, and the conclusions I have drawn from them, amount almost to a mathematical demonstration that the election has been attended with the greatest frauds on the part of the democrats. But perhaps the best and most complete evidence of these frauds, which permeated the entire election throughout the State, is to be found in the county of Edgefield. This county has a voting population, in round numbers, of 7,000, and yet there were 9,000 votes cast at the election, 2,000 more than existed in the whole county. This is a plain and palpable fraud upon its face. The mere statement of the facts is the most conclusive proof of its fraudulent character. This county borders upon Georgia, and I have been credibly informed that large numbers of the inhabitants of that State came over into Edgefield and voted. And I may also add that this is the most turbulent county in the State, one in which the most systematic violence and intimidation was practiced. I have been told by persons who were on the ground and had personal knowledge of what they said that at least 1,000 colored republican voters were prevented from voting.

And now, in the face of all these well-known facts, established by testimony taken by the committee which this House had sent to the State, as well as by other abundant and easily accessible evidence, we hear the cry of "fraud" alleged against the republicans in South Carolina after the late election. Having a perfectly legitimate majority, we had no reason whatever to perpetrate fraud in any conceivable form. This charge is brought against the board of State canvassers, or returning boards as they are called in the three Southern States—South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana—because they have exercised the judicial power vested in them by the constitution and laws of the respective States for the express purpose of counteracting such frauds, and preventing them from defeating the real will of the people of those States as expressed at the polls. I am well aware of the fact that it seems strange to the people of the Northern States that boards of State canvassers should be invested with judicial powers in canvassing the votes of the State, as these boards have only ministerial powers in the States of the North. I will presume, however, that no one can deny the legality of the exercise of such power where it has been plainly conferred by the constitution and the laws, though the wisdom of investing such boards with this power may be questioned. Circumstances in the South fully justify the policy of such a course. The southern democrats are so opposed to the possession and exercise by colored men of the elective franchise, especially as it is wielded in behalf of that party of liberty and progress which has given it to them and with which every feeling of gratitude and self-preservation induces them to co-operate, that they resort to every species of violence and fraud to neutralize and destroy the effect of their power, and we are thus compelled to resort to this means of defense and protection, namely, to invest these returning boards with power to prevent the effect of these frauds by obtaining a prima facie right to the result of the election.

Our attention has been diverted from the frauds at the polls and every effort made to confine and concentrate our gaze upon the action of the returning boards in exercising the perfectly legal but extraordinary power which the extraordinary state of things justifies, and by comparing that power with the functions of boards in other States where such power does not exist because the circumstances do not require them; to cry out "fraud" as against the action of the returning boards, but not to say a single word against the real and glaring frauds at the polls, which I have so fully and conclusively proven.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if it is necessary for me to add anything further to what I have already said, for if the unquestionable facts, here stated, fail to carry conviction to the minds of those who may somewhat differ with me on this question, then, indeed, they would not be convinced though one rose from the dead.

I have endeavored to show that there is a deep, an abiding objection to our exercise of the elective franchise, resulting from our former unfortunate condition of slavery. I have also stated that I regarded this slavery, which existed here for more than two centuries, as the primal cause of the unhappy and disturbed condition of our country, more or less, from its very foundation to the present day. I have thus proceeded, from these general remarks, into a minute and careful investigation of the charges of intimidation and fraud preferred against republicans at every election in our southern section. I have shown, I trust conclusively, that the charge of intimidation of democratic voters by the presence of United States soldiers at the polls is simply absurd and that the charge of fraud, as applied to democrats, is perfectly true. The pretended great reverence for law on the part of the democrats, by charging fraud and intimidation against the republicans, recalls to my mind these famous words:

> O liberty! liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!

The sudden regard which these gentlemen manifest for the sacred forms of law, while ignoring justice, mercy, and truth, is enough to make one feel serious, very serious, when the future is thought of. He who spake as never man spoke has said:

> Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

We ask only that removal of prejudice which denies us the right and privileges of citizens; that protection which every government, worth the name, is bound to give to its humblest subject; and that fairness, justice, and safety in the exercise of the ballot that make it a safeguard and bulwark of our political institutions, and not, instead thereof, an infernal machine in the hands of the newly enfranchised.

This being done, South Carolina will then be found with her sister republican States, standing steadfast for the perpetuation of our cherished institutions.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN REILLY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the proceedings of the House on the electoral count.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. Mr. Speaker, with the decision of the commission in the cases of Florida and Louisiana the presidential question is virtually ended; in the other States the questions of the ineligible electors seem to have but little to commend them for any action to change the result. The only one which, under the Constitution and laws, I would feel obliged to vote against is the case of Downs, elector for Wisconsin, who held an "office of trust and profit" both at the time of his election and when he sat as an elector and cast his vote. But while the law is clear in this case it is hardly to be expected that this infraction of it will be regarded by those who so flagrantly violated all law by their action in the counting of the votes of Florida and Louisiana, and while under the law the vote of Downs should be thrown out I do not hesitate to say that I think it a mistake that the votes of the people of Wisconsin should be nullified, as the entire vote of the State was intended to be cast for Hayes and Wheeler as clearly as the vote of Louisiana was cast for Tilden and Hendricks, and I hope that the next Congress will provide a proper amendment to the Constitution for submission to the States that will permit the people to vote their wishes in a manner that cannot be overturned by a constitutional provision which, in my opinion, was not conceived with a view to such a state of politics as we have at the present day.

I voted for the electoral commission bill hoping that the men selected would in good faith, as required by the bill and by the act of 1792, "ascertain and declare" the proper votes of the States that might be submitted to it. In the selection of the House part of the commission I voted for no one whose name was not a fair one before the country and whose character was not in any way "smirched" by their actions in public life. The action of the opposition placed on the commission some who violently opposed its creation and who denounced it as unconstitutional. The action of these men in seeking places in a body they denounced in that way could only be for a partisan purpose and will be so understood by the country. The portion of the commission selected from the Supreme Court the country had a right to expect would rise above partisanship, and atleast examine into the questions at issue before they decided. In this they were disappointed; they were just as firm to party convictions as those who went there to serve party ends. I refer, of course, to those members of the commission who voted against admitting any evidence which might guide them to a correct conclusion in the cases submitted to them. The law gave to the commission every right one or either of both Houses had to "ascertain" what were the correct votes; not to decide merely what papers seemed to be regular, and on their face bore the marks of legality. When these papers accorded with their views politically they decided they could not hear evidence which would be against their candidate, but when it was adverse they were very willing to hear testimony that might change the result in their favor.

It is very much to be regretted by all fair-minded men that the cases of Florida and Louisiana did not have a fair hearing before the commission; the people expected it, and there is good reason for the great dissatisfaction that has been expressed against the decision of the majority of the commission. This is not alone the feeling of the people of the defeated party. It is the feeling among a large number of the best men of the opposition, many of whom believe Mr. Tilden fairly elected.

Taking the case of Florida, I quote from the speech of Hon. W. J. PURMAN, Representative from that State, made on the floor of this House on the 13th of February, in which he says:

I waited impatiently for the special committee on Florida to submit the report of their investigation to this House, and again I looked forward with that reasonable expectation that the electoral commission would decide to admit evidence sufficient at least to satisfy the country as to which electors were really elected by the people of Florida, but I find now the appropriate opportunity to state from my own knowledge the true condition of the presidential vote in my State, concerning which so much is involved in misunderstanding and controversy.

The republican party in our State, with all its dissensions healed and with the whole machinery of the State government in its hands, went into the last campaign determined to win if our own resources and efforts, coupled with the most heroic devotion on the part of our voters, could achieve such an end.

Free speech and free locomotion were enjoyed to the fullest extent by the speakers and managers of both sides, and at no time during the campaign or from any portion of the State came up any cry of intimidation, with one or two minor exceptions. It was, without exception, the most peaceful election ever held in the State, and not one case of violence or disturbance on election day has come to my knowledge.

It seemed the peculiar privilege of the republicans to win under all these advantageous circumstances, but it is a fact, sir, which I cannot stand upon this floor and deny, and which every man, woman, and child in my State knows, that Florida was lost by the republican party in the late election, and that the democratic governor and the Tilden electors were truly elected. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

I make this declaration now under the most solemn sense of public duty and from an irresistible feeling of obligation to the people of my State, who have a right to expect that, however partisan their Representative may be in his political faith, he should at least on questions of public fact be an honest man. But, sir, I would not be understood in making this declaration as laying claim to any unusual amount of honesty or conscience, but I only assert my knowledge of the facts.

As Mr. PURMAN is a republican and took an active part in the campaign in his State he ought to know; in relation to the frauds there he states:

I know further that Comptroller Cowgill, a member of the board, was personally consulted upon the fact of this fraud having been committed, and that he gave his assurance that if it were plausibly covered up before the case came before them for adjudication, it should suffer no scrutiny or discount at his hands.

From which it seems that this board followed the example of the Louisiana one and stopped at nothing bad to make the result they desired.

These facts were known all over the country, yet the majority of the commission would not give Florida a hearing, while the republican supreme court of the State ordered a recanvass of the votes of the State, which elected the democratic governor.

The Louisiana case was much worse. Here was a clear majority for the Tilden electors of 7,639 changed by the returning board to a majority of 3,437 for the Hayes electors. This was done after a proposition was made to count the vote of the State for Tilden for a large amount of money, which, being rejected, they had to bargain elsewhere.

A committee of the last Congress—composed in part of GEORGE F. HOAR, one of the high commission; WILLIAM A. WHEELER, the republican candidate for Vice-President declared elected through the returning board and the commission; and WILLIAM P. FRYE, another leading member of that party—reported with reference to their official conduct as follows:

"Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house."

There was not so much at stake then for the party, but now that the Presidency and the offices for four years are in danger, Mr. Commissioner HOAR skillfully changes front and decides that they cannot go behind this return, thus indorsing and deliberately taking on his party the action of the board. That this board was notoriously corrupt has been shown by the evidence taken and reported to the House. In relation to Wells, who seems to have been the leader and head of its evil doings, General Sheridan has said in his official communications to his superiors:

Wells's conduct as governor has been notoriously corrupt. He had illegally appointed a board of levee commissioners, who were authorized to hold over by an act of the Legislature, and a conflict of authority ensued, and in the mean time the Mississippi overflowed and great damage was done to property. There was an appropriation of $4,000,000 made by the Legislature for repairs of the levees, and Wells wanted to finger some of this money.

Again, in a letter to the Secretary of War:

I say now, unequivocally, that Governor Wells is a political trickster and a dishonest man. I have seen him myself, when I first came to this command, turn out all of the Union men who had supported the Government, and put in their stead rebel soldiers, some of whom had not yet dropped their gray uniform. I have seen him again during the July riot of 1866, skulk away where I could not find him to give him a guard, instead of coming out as a manly representative of the State and joining those who were preserving the peace. I have watched him since, and his conduct has been sinuous as the mark left in the dust by the movement of a snake. I say again that he is dishonest, and dishonesty is more than must be expected of me.

Again, in a communication to General Grant:

He has embarrassed me very much since I came into command by his subterfuge and political chicanery. This necessary act will be approved by every class and shade of political opinion here. HE HAS NOT ONE FRIEND WHO IS AN HONEST MAN.

The select committee report on two of his colleagues as follows:

His colleague, Anderson, has no character for integrity; has defrauded the State while representing it in the senate. Having obtained control and ownership of a navigation company, to which a large sum had been donated by his vote and influence as a legislator to encourage an enterprise ostensibly in the public interest, he expended a nominal sum upon the work and appropriated the remainder to his own use.

Kenner, (colored,) another member of the returning board, was indicted for larceny, secured a dismissal of the prosecution after admission of his guilt, and was promptly made a member of the returning board.

The people expected from the commission a fair and honest review of the matters at issue; they expected a decision on the merits of the case. They have been sorely disappointed, and that which but a short time since was hailed as a tribunal which would give a fair and peaceful settlement of the difficulties, is now denounced all over the land as a fraud, as an indorser of falsehood, forgery, and all that is vile in politics. For the men on the commission who are the cause of this it matters but little; but when a portion of them who come from the highest court in the land (and which until this came has had nothing to shake the confidence of the people in it) thus draggles the judicial ermine in the mire, it strikes a place where every citizen must regret that with such a result they were ever placed upon it.

The only result of the action of the commission that can be commended to the people is that it is an experiment that they can hold up as an example, to never be tried again.

Although the conclusions reached are not in accordance with the facts or justice, I think it best that they be accepted, as it was clearly the intention of the law under which we are acting that the decisions of the commission were to be final "unless both Houses shall determine otherwise." I can see no safety in any other course of action; the wisest heads of the party see nothing beyond but anarchy and confusion; and, while civil war would be doubtful, yet no man could say that it might not at any time be brought about. The Army has been brought here after aiding the returning boards in the South to accomplish their mission. The heads that directed that move would not be likely to hesitate at bloodshed here to accomplish their ends. Once begun no man can foresee the end. Therefore I for one shall accept the result, as I believe the people will, and leave it to them, when the proper time comes, to remedy the wrong and punish the wrong-doers. I do not wish to reflect on any of my friends who take a different course, they believe that fraud should not be legalized, and take the high ground that wrong should be defeated at all hazards; yet they cannot point out a safe port to be reached in so doing.

CONDITION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The following is printed by order of the House heretofore made, and is to constitute a part of House Report No. 175, Part 2, second session Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. LAWRENCE submitted the following:

The undersigned members of the committee of the House of Representatives, charged with the duty of investigating the recent election in South Carolina, submit the following as their

REPORT:

The committee was appointed under a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of December last, which directed them—

"To proceed to South Carolina to investigate recent elections therein and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said State in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said State for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people."

A large amount of evidence was taken at Columbia and Charleston, which fully discloses the actual result of the election held in South Carolina on the 7th of November last for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and which presents many facts essential to a fair understanding of the manner in which the election was held, the mode of conducting the political canvass and discussions preceding it, the influences exerted to operate upon voters, the general condition or the State and its government, and the necessity for legislation to secure freedom of discussion and to give protection to the civil and political rights of citizens.

THE REPUBLICAN ELECTORS OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT DULY APPOINTED.

It is not claimed by any member of the committee that any one of the democratic candidates for electors of President and Vice-President was duly appointed or ever had any shadow of claim to the office. On the contrary, it is admitted by the majority of the committee in their report that they "believe that they have obtained with substantial accuracy the number of votes cast, so far as it can be obtained from the present managers' returns," as follows:[1]

[1] To this the report adds, "but no opinion is advanced upon the truth and accuracy of these returns." We will now add, the evidence fully sustains them. Not one instance can be produced where there is any proof to show any error or wrong as against any democratic candidate in the result as stated. This result is produced by taking the footings found on table 2, page 36 of the appendix to evidence, and by adding votes proved to have been given for each republican elector 4,072 votes, and for each democratic candidate 4,643. These additions are made up of the following votes:

County.	Precinct.	Republican vote.	Democratic vote.
Abbeville	Calhoun's Mills	467	247
Aiken	Windsor	54	376
	Silverton	232	182

Wilson Cook	92,110	John B. Erwin	91,247
William F. Myers	92,124	Robert Aldrich	91,200

This gives to C. C. Bowen, the republican elector having the lowest vote, a majority of 831 votes over Samuel McGowan, who had the highest democratic vote, and shows that all the republican electors had a majority of the popular vote.

ABBEVILLE POLL NO. 2.

Prior to the election, the county commissioners of election established a poll, designated as Abbeville No. 2, at Abbeville Court-House, in Abbeville County. At this poll the republican electors received 432 votes and the democratic electors only 10. The other voting-precinct was designated as Abbeville No. 1, and is so described in the returns and all proceedings as to the election. At this poll the republican electors received 341 votes and the democratic electors 446.

Prior to the statute of March 29, 1875, the county commissioners of election designated all voting-places. They are authorized to appoint all managers of election.

In several instances the tables in appendix have notes saying: "Poll not authorized by law;" but the evidence shows the polls were authorized by law, under a different name equally well understood.

The evidence warrants a small increase on the votes of the republican electors in addition to that above given, and perhaps a small decrease in the vote given above to the democratic candidates; but the differences are so small as to be practically immaterial.

It is claimed by the report submitted by a portion of the committee that this poll No. 2 "was illegal and unauthorized, and that no votes cast there should be counted." If this were so, it would not change the result of the election; and, so far as presidential electors are concerned, it would not be material, though it might be important as to other officers.

The same argument which could prove that poll No. 2 was illegal would show the same as to poll No. 1, and so reject it. The law did not establish Abbeville No. 1. It established a polling-place at Abbeville. The commissioners appointed two sets of managers. The authority of each was from the same source, and equal. The law did not establish either poll by name. The officers were all at least de facto such, and at most it would be an irregularity which could not affect the vote or deprive voters of their right to be counted in the result. This is clear by authorities referred to elsewhere. But the county commissioners had authority to establish these polls, as the statutes show.[2]

THE VOTE OF ROBBINS PRECINCT.

To the vote as stated, there should be added for the republican electors 1,317 votes cast at Robbins precinct, in Barnwell County.[3]

This and the adjoining precinct of Canaan's Fair Church and others adjacent were largely republican. The democratic rifle clubs had evidently determined that no election should be held at least at Robbins and Canaan's Fair Church. It was understood that the election officers would be, as they were, kept away from the Canaan's Fair poling-place by threats of violence.[4]

The republican voters of Canaan's Fair precinct, and from Millett's, an adjoining precinct, and others, very generally voted at Robbins in consequence of the violence against them.

By law voters could vote at any polling-place in the county. The republicans frequently "massed their vote;" that is, arranged that voters would go from several precincts to some particular locality, for the purpose of mutual protection and safety. This will account for the large vote cast at Robbins. The polls were regularly opened, with the proper officers, at about the usual time in the morning, and the voting proceeded until a little after eleven o'clock a. m., up to which time there had assembled, in all, about fifty white men, democrats, and five hundred or more colored republican voters, of whom about forty democrats and two hundred and forty republicans had voted. (Evidence, part 1, pages 67, 74, 89.)

At this point a crowd of democrats, concealed in the woods near by, fired about a dozen shots upon the building in which the election was being held, the bullets passing through the plank weatherboards and partition and near the heads of the election officers. They immediately fled; the poll-box in the confusion was lost, and the democrats, with the democratic manager and the democratic supervisor of election, immediately left. The colored voters thereupon at once rallied, and in less than an hour opened a poll with a pine box, picked up for the occasion, at a school-house a little over a quarter of a mile from the depot, at which place 1,317 votes were cast for the republican candidates.

The election was regularly conducted, from about noon until six p. m., by two managers of election, and the proper return made and signed in due form. (Ev., 85–114.) A return was also made in due form by the deputy United States supervisor to the district supervisor. (Ev., 95–168.) A poll-list was regularly kept. (Ev., Appendix, page 183.) It is abundantly proved that the vote was actually and honestly cast.

To this it may be added that the referee appointed by the supreme court of South Carolina, in the proceedings to contest the election of the State officers, after a thorough examination of all the facts on sworn testimony, included in his report to the court the vote of the Robbins precinct as entirely legal and correct. (See court proceedings, Appendix to part 1 of evidence.)

On Friday, November 19, the two managers started to Barnwell, the county seat, a distance of eighteen miles, with the proper returns, to deliver them to the county canvassers, when they were stopped by an armed body of about fifteen white men, who threatened to shoot them if they attempted to proceed. (Ev., 76.) They started to return, but finally took another road and reached the county canvassers about nine p. m.

The county canvassers met to canvass the vote of the county on Friday morning, November 10, when it was proposed by one of the republican commissioners to adjourn over a day, in order that the return from Robbins might be brought in. There were a number of armed democrats about the building, and another member of the board, through fear of violence, voted with the democratic commissioner to proceed with the canvass. (Ev., 98–102, 123.) They did so, sitting up all night, and completed the canvass about 7 a. m. on Saturday, November 11, although the law permitted them to keep the canvass open until the Tuesday following.

While the canvass was going on, about 9 p. m., November 10, the two managers from Robbins produced the proper returns, with box and ballots, but the commissioners, fearful of violence, did not dare to and did not receive them. (Ev., 103.) After the canvass was complete, one of the county canvassers received the returns and delivered them to the secretary of state. They were not counted by the State board of canvassers because not included in the county canvassers' return.

No objection can be taken to the place of holding this election.

In Chadwick vs. Melvin, 68 Pa. State R., 484, the court said:

"I will not say that in case of the destruction of a designated building on the eve of the election the election might not be held on the same or contiguous ground as a matter of necessity—necessitus non habet legem." (McCrary, Law of Elections, sec. 116.)

The republican electors were duly appointed by all the forms of law. The thirty-two counties of the State are divided by law into four hundred and ninety-one voting-precincts. The election law requires the governor to appoint, in each county, three "commissioners of election," who constitute a "county board of canvassers," and it is made their duty to appoint "three managers of election for each election precinct," and these appoint a clerk.

The chairman of the board of precinct managers is required to "deliver to the [county] commissioner of election the poll-list, the boxes containing the ballots, and a written statement of the result of the election in his precinct." It is made the duty of the chairman of the board of county canvassers to forward, addressed to the secretary of state, a statement of the result of the election, made by the county canvassers from the precinct managers' returns, together with the precinct managers' returns, poll-lists, and protests.[5]

Returns were forwarded from every county, but in some cases they were not duly signed by all or a majority of the county canvassers, and the precinct managers' returns from about twenty-five precincts in all were not forwarded to the secretary of state, and in some cases the precinct managers' returns were defective in form or not duly signed. But these irregularities could not in any event affect the appointment of the republican electors of President and Vice-President for several reasons, which it may be proper briefly to notice.

I. The republican electors were legally declared duly appointed and received the lawful evidence thereof.

It is by law made the duty of certain State officers, who constitute a board of State canvassers, "upon the certified copies of the statements made by the board of county canvassers, to proceed to make a statement of the whole number of votes given" for each elector of President and Vice-President, "distinguishing the several counties in which they were given," and "on the proper statement a certificate of their determination," and "determine and declare what persons have been by the greatest number of votes duly elected."[6] This duty was performed, and the executive authority of the State duly certified the proper lists of the republican electors, and that they were duly appointed as required by law.[7]

The republican electors, thus armed with the evidence of their due and legal appointment, by the declaration of the State board of canvassers and the certificate of the governor and secretary of state under the great seal of the State, had more than the requisite legal evidence of authority.

II. The republican electors had in fact a majority of the popular vote.

This result is shown (1) by the determination of the State board of canvassers; (2) by all the original county canvassers' returns; (3) by those county canvassers' returns which were regular in form; (4) by all the precinct managers' returns forwarded to the secretary of state; (5) by all of those which were regular in form; and (6) by the votes as shown by all the precinct managers' returns forwarded to the secretary of state, and by the vote as supplied by other evidence for the precincts as to which no managers' returns were so forwarded.

And this is so in all these forms, without including the vote of Robbins precinct.

This is by no means important, except as it shows the gratifying fact that the legal result is such as is fully warranted by the choice of the voters of the State.

III. It is not competent, in the "count" of the electoral votes required by the constitution, to "go back of the returns," as declared by the State canvassers, and the governor's certificate based on them, to inquire into the authority of the electors.

This subject has been so fully considered in the recent debates in Congress that it seems unnecessary to go into a full discussion of it now.

A portion of the committee in their report have in substance declared that, inasmuch as the recent election in South Carolina was held without a law for the registration of voters, the right of presidential electors appointed at such election to vote for President may be questioned, if not denied.[8]

A proposition so novel, so startling, so revolutionary and dangerous, seems to require some notice here.

[2] By virtue of an act entitled "An act to establish by law the voting-precincts in the various counties of this State," approved March 29, 1875, the voting-precincts for the county of Abbeville were established as follows, namely: "In the county of Abbeville there shall be seventeen voting-precincts, as follows: Abbeville Court House, Calhoun Mills, Saint Charlotte, Cokesbury, Greenwood, Ninety-six, Donaldsville, Due West, Centreville, Childs' Cross-Roads, Smithville, Lowndesville, Magnolia, White Hall, Long Cane, and Cedar Springs."

Under this provision of the statute and the general election law, (General Statutes, 28,) the election commissioners for the county established two voting-places at Abbeville Court House and designated them No. 1 and No. 2, as is usual throughout said act of 1875, where two or more polls are established at the same place. Now, it is asked what authority of law was there for establishing two voting-places at Abbeville Court House.

The statute above quoted says there shall be seventeen voting-precincts in the county of Abbeville, and then mentions but *sixteen place*s as voting-precincts.

The county commissioners of election obviously considered that seventeen voting-precincts being authorized by statute, they had power to establish so many by appointing managers and furnishing boxes, and the seventeenth not being designated by statute, it was in their power to designate it.

This follows from the familiar principle of law, universally recognized, that where a power is clearly given by statute or other instrument, all the incidents necessary to the execution of the power are presumed to be given.

Statutes in favor of the public, or in which the public have an interest, are always liberally construed. Now, under the general election law, (General Statutes, page 29, section 2,) the three election commissioners of each county appoint three managers for each election precinct, and (section 11, id.) provide one box, and until the passage of this act of March 29, 1875, they "designated" all the "voting-places" (section 5, id.) throughout the county.

This latter act was doubtless designed generally to take away this power from the election commissioners of designating the voting-precincts, but as to this seventeenth polling-place in Abbeville County, it failed to do this by omitting to name the precinct, and, therefore, as to this precinct the general statute is of force and the election commissioners have power to designate it.

See the regular poll-list, Appendix to Evidence, part 1, pp. 183–190.

[4] This is shown by the following: "Return of the election to have been held at Canaan Fair Church precinct, Barnwell County, November 7, 1876. David Mixson and Isaac Allen, two of the managers of election for this precinct, both republicans, went to Blackville for the ballot-box and never returned, and when the voters assembled at six o'clock a. m., no managers were present, except Marion Wall, democrat. In consequence of the absence of the managers and the ballot-box, no election was held at this precinct. David Mixson, the manager in charge of the ballot-box, produced at Barnwell Court House an anonymous letter, of which the following is a copy, as his excuse for not discharging his official duty:

Mr. DAVID MIXSON:

You had better not go to the voting-precinct of Canaan's Fair, as we heard that there would be no soldiers there and we intend to carry that box or kill you and the other man, so I, as friend, warn you to stay away from there. Take heed to what I say.

Your friend,

JUDAS.

I, the undersigned supervisor, certify that the above is a correct return of the election held at Canaan Fair precinct, of Barnwell County, on the 7th day of November, 1876.

GEO. H. BATES, Supervisor.

OFFICE OF CHIEF SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS, DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, December 19, 1876.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the election return of Canaan's Fair Church precinct, Barnwell County; that George H. Bates, whose signature is affixed thereto, was the democratic supervisor, duly appointed, for said precinct; that the republican supervisor appointed for said precinct has made no return of said election.

SAMUEL T. POINIER,
Chief Supervisor of Elections, District of South Carolina.

[8] The report says:

"Under such circumstances, it is worthy of grave consideration whether any officials who are to participate in the election of a Chief Magistrate or in making laws for the whole country should be recognized, they only claiming an election when the constitutional mandate to provide a registration of voters has been entirely disregarded."

* * * * * * * *

"In order that such appointment should be legal it must be in compliance with the Constitution, not in conflict with it. * * * It would seem clear this was not appointment by the State when it is in conflict with its organic law. * * *

"Under these circumstances, it is for the House of Representatives to consider what effect is to be given to an election so held."

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

"The executive power shall be vested in a President, * * * elected as follows:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or persons holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." (Article 2, section 1.)

"The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President; * * * they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed."

It has been well observed that (aside from judicial remedies, if any) the creation of the electoral college "is absolutely and uncontrollably in the power of the States," subject to five limitations: (1) there must be a State: (2) the number of electors is limited; (3) members of Congress and officers of the United States are made (by a directory or peremptory provision) ineligible as electors; (4) the time of their appointment may be fixed by Congress; and (5) Congress may fix the time when their appointment is announced.

There is no pretense that any of these limitations have been invaded. From our earliest history as to many officers of the State and National Governments there have been and are two well-defined, well-understood, and completely distinct proceedings affecting the right of office; ONE IS THE OFFICIAL CANVASS OF VOTES AND THE DECLARATION OF A RESULT which gives a prima facie right to the office; THE OTHER IS A CONTEST OF AN ELECTION, either (1) by a special statutory mode, or (2) by a proceeding in quo warranto, or (3) in some cases by certiorari.

It is affirmed in every elementary law book and every judicial decision on the subject that the CANVASS OF VOTES is an EXECUTIVE DUTY, purely MINISTERIAL in its character, and that a board having only such powers cannot "go behind the returns."

The whole law is summed up in a few words by an able writer, whose valuable work on the American law of elections is a standard authority, and who says canvassing officers (who are given no other power than to canvass or count) "must receive and count the votes as shown by the returns, and they cannot go behind the returns for any purpose, and this necessarily implies that if a paper is presented as a return and there is a question as to whether it is a return or not, they must decide that question from what appears upon the face of the paper itself;"[9] or, as it is said elsewhere of canvassers, "their duty consists in a simple matter of arithmetic"—to count.

Of course, every officer is bound to know (1) the existence of a State, (2) the legal number of electors, (3) the legal time of their appointment, and (4) the day on which they shall vote for President and Vice-President.

Canvassing officers (unless properly authorized) cannot even inquire into a question of fraud.[10] These, like all approved rules of law, are founded on solid reasons, among which may be named (1) the necessity for a speedy decision, so as to secure officers without delay; (2) the impossibility of procuring a sufficient number of canvassing officers having the requisite legal learning and judicial qualifications to decide contested elections in advance of a declaration of the result of an election; (3) the encouragements it would give to contests if every canvassing board had power to entertain them; (4) the necessity of preserving distinct and independent the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of government, and many others.

To reverse this law and usage now would unsettle the very foundations of government, introduce anarchy and confusion, shock the legal and judicial mind of the world, and be abhorrent to the common sense of mankind.

The foregoing was written before the electoral commission, under the act of Congress of January 29, 1877, had rendered its decisions; but they fully sustain the views above given.

But this limited jurisdiction of canvassing officers would, in many cases, result in much wrong if there should be no remedy. In most cases there is a remedy which goes back of the returns on which canvassing officers act. This is at common law by quo warranto, or in some of the States by special statutory contest, both in the judicial courts, and involving the exercise of judicial power.

By our Constitution each House of Congress is expressly given power to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members." This gives a remedy which goes back of the returns of the election by canvassing officers. It does so because canvassing officers cannot do so. They cannot, as to members of Congress, even inquire as to "qualifications."

The Constitution of the United States requires the States to appoint electors, in such manner as the Legislature may direct; the electors are required to vote for President; their votes are to be sent to the President of the Senate, and then all that follows is found in these words:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President."

Here is a naked power, either in the President of the Senate or the two Houses of Congress, to count the votes.

This creates a canvassing officer or board, with power only to COUNT VOTES SIGNED, CERTIFIED, and TRANSMITTED by ELECTORS.

There is no power given in this count to "judge of the ELECTIONS, RETURNS, or QUALIFICATIONS" of electors.

The power so to judge is carefully excluded, and for more than the five reasons above given THIS COUNT must be made.

It has been determined by the recent act of Congress creating the electoral commission that the two Houses of Congress, as a canvassing board, may NOT transfer their power to count to the commission, but may be advised by the commission as to what are lawful votes. The commission has no judicial power, because the Constitution says all judicial power is vested in courts. (Art. III, sec. 1.) The commission is not a court, because the judges of a court can only be appointed by the President. (Art. II, sec. 2.) Its members are not even officers, because these can only be appointed by the President; and the commission is composed in part of members of Congress, who cannot hold any office created, as this commission was, during the term for which they were elected. (Art. I, sec. 6.) Any attempt to give the commission a power to advise the Houses to do what the Constitution does not authorize the Houses to do would be void. The Houses may, indeed judge who are electors, but when their votes come with the evidence of appointment prescribed by law it is conclusive, and there is no power to go back of it, because (1) the Houses have no power to "judge of the elections, disqualifications, and returns" of electors; (2) the only power is to count THE votes, (which are those transmitted to the President of the Senate, duly certified;) (3) this duty is made imperative, and excludes all right to take evidence with a view to set them aside or not to count them, and (4) it must be done when the votes are opened—"THEN"—so that it is impossible to conceive that it was intended to permit an inquiry on all forms of evidence that might affect an election and the due appointment of electors.

From all this it must be certain that the Houses of Congress, as a canvassing board, cannot inquire if the electors have been "appointed in such manner as the Legislature" of the State has directed.

Such inquiry would require the Houses of Congress to "judge of the election returns and qualifications of electors," when no power is given by the Constitution to do so, and when such power is excluded by necessary implication and the limited terms in which their only power is given—"the votes shall then be counted."

It would or might require an investigation of the regularity of the returns from every voting precinct in the United States!

It would or might require an investigation of the lawful residence and other qualifications of every voter in the United States!

It would bring other and multitudinous inquiries, which it would be impossible for the Houses to consider.

It would ignore the well-settled rules of law, and reverse the practice of the Houses for nearly a century.

But if the monstrous doctrine were allowed that the Houses of Congress could go into a State to make these inquiries, they could not, upon any principle of law, disregard and set aside the appointment of electors upon the ground stated in the report submitted by a portion of the members of the committee.

The constitution of South Carolina provides that—

"It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide, from time to time, for the registration of all electors."

It is assumed by a portion of the committee that the General Assembly has failed in this duty, that fraudulent voting has resulted, and that therefore—

"Under these circumstances, it is for the House of Representatives to consider what effect is to be given to an election so held."

In reply to this, it is proposed now to show—

1. That clause of the constitution as to registration is directory, and a failure to comply with it cannot affect the result of an election.

2. The State constitution cannot take from the Legislature the power given to it by the Constitution of the United States to provide for the appointment of electors without registration "in such manner as the Legislature may direct." And as a matter of fact the fraudulent voting was by democrats in the interest of democratic candidates.

3. The Legislature has complied with the constitutional provision requiring registration.

1. This provision of the constitution is DIRECTORY, resting for its execution on the conscience of the Legislature; and a failure to provide for registration does not invalidate or affect the result of the election.

The constitution of Ohio provides as to the Legislature that—

"No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

But the Supreme Court has said this provision—

"is directory only, and the supervision of its observance must be left to the General Assembly. * * * It is not to be enforced by judicial interposition. * * * It would be most mischievous in practice to make the validity of every law to depend upon the judgment of every judicial tribunal as to whether an act or bill contained more than one subject. * * * The only safeguard against the violation of these rules of the houses is their regard for and their oath to support the Constitution?"[11]

Here was a duty imposed by the constitution on the Legislature, but a neglect of this duty does not invalidate laws which fail to conform to the constitutional requisition.

The Constitution of the United States, higher than any State constitution, requires the State Legislatures to provide for the appointment of electors. A failure by the Legislature to follow all the directions of the State constitution as to the registration of voters cannot defeat the duty imposed on the State by the "higher law" of the supreme national Constitution, or disfranchise a State in the election of a President.

The right of the National Government to have each State participate in a presidential election cannot be defeated by the wrong of the Legislature in not complying with the directions of the State constitution. The right of the entire people of the United States to have all the States represented in the choice of a President cannot be defeated by the wrong stated.

The constitution of South Carolina requires the election of State and county officers by popular vote. To say that an election is void without a registration law is to affirm that the Legislature may dissolve the entire State and local government

"In all bodies that are under law, the law is that where there has been an authorized election for the office in controversy, the certificate of election which is sanctioned by law or usage is the prima facie written title to the office, and can be set aside only by a contest in the form prescribed by law; this is not now disputed. No doubt this gives great power to dishonest election officers, but we know no remedy for this but by the choice of honest men."

"It is proper here, in this connection, to again refer to the language already quoted from the same authority, (page 638:)

"It is objected that a rule that attributes so much power to the officers of the previous year gives them an advantage which they may use arbitrarily and fraudulently against the new members, so as to secure to themselves an illegitimate majority. No doubt this may be so; but no law can guard against such frauds so as to entirely prevent them, just as it cannot entirely prevent stealing and perjury and bribery; the people are liable to such frauds at every step in the process of an election or organization. But so much the more need for order and law in this part of the process; the law can dictate that, though it cannot furnish honesty and sound judgment to the actors in it. That the law and order which we have announced have existed so long and so generally is proof, at least, that they are better than no law at all."

and produce anarchy. Certainly the convention which made the Constitution never intended so disastrous a result to follow the omission to enact a registry law. Yet if this omission defeats the right of the State to representation in the electoral college, it would legalize a more fearful anarchy than that which unfortunately prevails in South Carolina now.

The statues regulating elections in this State provides that—

"All bar-rooms, saloons, and other places for the sale of liquors by retail shall be closed at six o'clock of the evening preceding the day of election and remain closed until six o'clock on the morning of the day thereafter; and during the time aforesaid, the sale of all intoxicating liquors is prohibited."[12]

And a penalty is provided on conviction.

If the State can be deprived of its electoral vote for want of a registration law, it might, with equal propriety, be so deprived for the non-enforcement of this provision, for it is a part of the election machinery prescribed by the Legislature for the appointment of electors.

The claim now set up would invest Congress with a power to furnish pretexts for disfranchising States and dictate the selection of a President. The legislative power would absorb the executive and defeat the purpose of the Constitution. This is a danger which the framers of the Constitution never intended to authorize. It has been forcibly said that "if there was no check upon the tyranny of legislative majorities the prospect before us would be gloomy in the extreme." (1 Kent, 450, note, 11th ed.) One of the "checks" provided by the Constitution is that THE electoral votes forwarded in due form from the States should not be rejected by "the tyranny of legislative majorities," but should, when opened, "THEN be counted"

In the light of authority and reason, it seems certain the omission to enact a registration law cannot affect the appointment of electors.

2. The State constitution cannot take from the Legislature the right given to it by the Constitution of the United States to appoint electors without a registration of voters "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct."

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

"Each State shall appoint [electors] in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct."

In every State the Legislature has provided by law for the appointment of electors by popular vote. This is done in pursuance of authority given to the Legislature by the Constitution of the United States. This legislative authority exists not by force of any State constitution, but the "supreme law" above it. As the power is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and is given in plenary and unlimited terms, the State Legislature is made the exclusive judge of the manner in which popular elections shall be authorized, regulated, conducted, and the result declared, subject only to the obligations of the amendments of the Constitution in relation to suffrage and such regulations as Congress may be authorized to make.

A State constitution can no more require a "registration law" against the judgment of the Legislature than it can impose restraints on the powers given by the national Constitution to Congress.

The provision of the South Carolina constitution requiring a registration law is itself unconstitutional and void, so far as it attempts to impose a duty on the Legislature to require registration of voters authorized to participate in the appointment of electors.

This may be illustrated by other provisions of the Constitution of the United States. This provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations," &c.

In discussing the powers of State constitutional conventions, Jameson, a law-writer of acknowledged authority, denies in emphatic terms that they can make any regulation affecting "the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress." He says:

"The rule is general, that it is the State Legislatures which apportion their several States for congressional electors."[13]

And he shows that the exceptional cases in which constitutional conventions have provided for the election of Representatives, upon the creation of a new State, derive their validity from the action of Congress in ratifying them. His language is, that Congress "having the power to 'make or alter,' Congress doubtless might ratify such regulations, however made; or if a State, actual or inchoate, were in such a condition that it had no lawful Legislature, Congress might itself, for the sake of convenience, establish them by its direct action."

The great American commentator, whose researches explored every field of legal learning and left their impress on all, Mr. Justice Story, in the Massachusetts constitutional convention of 1820, in discussing this subject, said:

"The question then was whether we have a right to insert in our constitution a provision which controls or destroys a discretion which may be, nay must be, exercised by the Legislature in virtue of powers confided to it by the Constitution of the United States.

"The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States declares, 'That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.'

"Here an express provision was made for the manner of choosing Representatives by the State Legislatures. They have an unlimited discretion on the subject. They may provide for an election in single districts, in districts sending more than one, or by general ticket for the whole State. Here is a general discretion, a power of choice. What is the proposition on the table? It is to limit this discretion, to leave no choice to the Legislature to compel Representatives to be chosen in districts; in other words, to compel them to be chosen in a specific manner, excluding all others. Was not this plainly a violation of the Constitution? Does it not affect to control the Legislature in the exercise of its legitimate powers? Does it not interfere with the superintending authority of Congress? * * * It assumes a control over the Legislature which the Constitution of the United States does not justify. It is bound to exercise its authority according to its own view of public policy and principle; and yet this proposition compels it to surrender all discretion. In my humble judgment * * * it is a direct and palpable infringement of the constitutional provisions to which I have referred."

There is nothing new in the suggestion that a State constitution may in some of its provisions be unconstitutional and void, because in conflict with the higher Constitution of the United States.[14]

But it is not necessary to say that there is any conflict between the national and State constitutions.

By a well-known rule of construction, the provisions in relation to registration at most must be deemed as intended only to apply to registration for elections exclusively under State authority.[15]

It seems certain then that the Legislature of South Carolina has been guilty of no omission of duty in relation to registration.

THE FRAUDULENT VOTING WAS BY DEMOCRATS, FOR DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES.

The evidence taken by the committee very conclusively shows that fraudulent voting was practiced extensively by democrats, and in the interest of democratic candidates, and that the instances of fraudulent voting by republicans were so rare that they could not affect the election of any candidate for the smallest office in any precinct; so rare as to be utterly insignificant when compared with the carefully devised, systematic, wide-spread fraudulent voting by democrats.

3. The Legislature has complied with the constitutional provision requiring registration.

The election law provides as to each voting-precinct that—

"Each clerk of the poll shall keep a poll-list, which shall contain one column headed 'names of voters,' and the name of each elector voting shall be entered by the clerk in such column"

These are public records, which in each county belong to the files of the county commissioners of election. This is a substantial compliance with the constitutional provision requiring a "registration of all electors."

Besides this, the revised statutes of 1873 require a complete census to be taken on or before April 15, 1875, and every tenth year thereafter and the census for each county is to be deposited with the county auditor. The law, or rather the official instructions under it, require the census return to show the names of all male persons over twenty-one years of age, and these are voters. This gives a complete registration of all voters, and is a substantial compliance with the constitutional provision requiring registration. This law has been faithfully executed, and furnished the means of detecting illegal voters.

CIVIL OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES HAVE POWER TO PROTECT VOTERS.

At the recent election in South Carolina, Representatives in Congress were to be and were elected by popular vote in pursuance of law. The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to make all appropriate regulations as to this election.[16] In pursuance of this power, Congress has provided two classes of civil officers, whose services may be required when necessary, in connection with the proper election officers under State authority, to preserve the purity of the election and afford protection to voters. These officers are supervisors of election and deputy United States marshals.[17]

It is made the duty of supervisors to challenge illegal voters, to inspect the canvass of votes, and otherwise secure an honest election.

The deputy marshals are required to keep the peace, support and protect the supervisors, preserve order at the polls, and arrest, for trial, persons who may molest voters in the exercise of their rights, or officers in the performance of their duties.[18] The marshals are expressly authorized by act of Congress to summon to their aid, when necessary, the posse comitatus of the proper district.[19] These are wise provisions, made to protect citizens in the enjoyment of the elective franchise, where occasion may require. It is to the everlasting credit of President Grant that they have been faithfully executed, so far as it was possible.[20] It has been gravely

[20] The following is the circular-letter of instructions issued under date of September 14, 1876, by Hon. Alfonso Taft, Attorney-General, to the United States marshals of districts where they were necessary:

SIR: The laws of the United States having made it my duty to exercise general direction over marshals in the manner of discharging their offices, I have prepared for their use this circular-letter of instructions as to the coming elections; intending the same also as a reply once for all to numerous applications, in like connection, from private citizens in various States.

In the present condition of legislation, the United States occupy a position toward voters and voting which varies according as the election is for State and other local officers only, or for members of Congress and presidential electors.

In elections at which members of the House of Representatives are chosen, which by law include also elections at which the electors for President and Vice-President are appointed, the United States secure voters against whatever in general hinders or prevents them from a free exercise of the elective franchise—extending that care alike to the registration-lists, the act of voting, and the personal freedom and security of the voter at all times as well against violence on account of any vote that he may intend to give, as against conspiracy because of any that he may already have given.

The peace of the United States therefore, which you are to preserve, and whose violation you are to suppress, precedes as well as follows such elections, and protects (among others) the rights specified in the last paragraph, so that any person who by force violates those rights breaks that peace and renders it your duty to arrest him, and to suppress any riots incident, or that threaten the integrity of the registration or election, to the end that the will of the people in such election may be ascertained and take effect, and that offenders may be brought before the courts for punishment.

Notorious events in several States, which recently and in an unusual manner have been publicly reprobated, render it a grave duty of all marshals, who have cause to apprehend a violation of the peace of the United States connected as above with the elections to be held upon the Tuesday after the first Monday in November next, to be prepared to preserve and to restore such peace.

As the chief exective officer of the United States in your district, you will be held responsible for all breaches of the peace of the United States which diligence on your part might have prevented, and for the arrest and securing of all persons who violate that peace in any of the points above enumerated.

Diligence in these matters requires, of course, that you be, and continue, present, in person or by deputy, at all places of registration or election at which you have reason to suspect that the peace is threatened; and that whenever an embodiment of the posse comitatus is required to enforce the law, such embodiment be effected.

You will observe that the "special" deputies mentioned in section 2021 of the Revised Statutes have peculiar duties assigned to them, duties which otherwise do not belong to deputy marshals. Such "special" deputies can be appointed only in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward.

But the duties assigned to marshals and their deputies by section 2022 or other like statutes belong to all duly appointed deputies, whether they be general or be "special" within the meaning of that and the preceding section. Deputies to discharge this latter class of duties may be appointed to any number whatever, according to the discretion of the marshal. in all States in which sheriffs have a similar power. Section 2030 has no practical bearing upon this point in States where no limit is imposed upon the appointment of deputies by sheriffs, because in such States the laws of the United States, "prior to the 10th of June, 1872," left marshals also unlimited as to the number of their deputies.

In discharging the duties above mentioned, you will doubtless receive the countenance and support of all the good citizens of the United States in your respective districts. It is not necessary to say that it is upon such countenance and support that the United States mainly rely in their endeavor to enforce the right to vote which they have given or have secured. The present instructions are intended only to counteract that partial malice, wrongheadedness, or inconsideration which sometimes triumphs at critical moments over the conservative and, in general, prevailing forces of society, and to which the present and passing condition of the urged that there were too many marshals in the State. One-third of them were democrats. In view of the violence and intimidation shown to have existed by democrats against republicans, it is quite certain there were not a sufficient number of marshals to give that protection which a regard for the rights of citizens, and even common honesty required.

The statute of South Carolina provides that "the State constables and other peace officers of each county are required to be present during the whole time that the polls are kept open, * * * and they shall prevent all interference with the managers, and see that there is no interruption of good order."

In every State there is doubtless provision made for preserving the peace and giving protection to citizens. If a State government cannot give adequate protection, there can be no just objection that it should be afforded by the National Government in those cases authorized by the Constitution and laws. To deny its propriety is to assert that intimidation and violence should be unrestrained, and that the rights of citizens should be violated with impunity. A political party which adopts this as its purpose and policy, in the face of outrages unparalleled, and of cold-blooded murder, to accomplish success in an election, deserves the reprobation and abhorrence of every civilized community. The republican party shares no such purpose. The President deserves the gratitude of all just men for his statement of the duty of the Government, and the patriotic purpose so well announced in his letter to Governor Chamberlain, of July 26, 1876, as follows, (Senate Executive Document, No. 85, first session, Forty-fourth Congress:)

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington D. C., July, 26, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 22d of July, and all the inclosures enumerated therein, giving an account of the late barbarous massacre of innocent men at the town of Hamburgh, South Carolina. The views which you express as to the duty you owe to your oath of office, and to the citizens, to secure to all their civil rights, including the right to vote according to the dictates of their own consciences, and the further duty of the Executive of the nation to give all needful aid, when properly called on to do so, to enable you to insure this inalienable right, I fully concur in. The scene at Hamburgh, as cruel, bloodthirsty, wanton, unprovoked, and as uncalled for as it was, is only a repetition of the course that has been pursued in other southern States within the last few years, notably in Mississippi and Louisiana. Mississippi is governed to-day by officials chosen through fraud and violence, such as would scarcely be accredited to savages, much less to a civilized and Christian people. How long these things are to continue, or what is to be the final remedy, the great Ruler of the Universe only knows. But I have an abiding faith that the remedy will come, and come speedily, and earnestly hope that it will come peacefully. There has never been a desire on the part of the North to humiliate the South. Nothing is claimed for one State that is not freely accorded to all the others, unless it may be the right to kill negroes and republicans without fear of punishment, and without loss of caste or reputation. This has seemed to be a privilege claimed by a few States.

I repeat again that I fully agree with you as to the measure of your duties in the present emergency, and as to my duties. Go on, and let every governor, where the same dangers threaten the peace of his State, go on in the conscientious performance of his duties to the humblest as well as the proudest citizen, and I will give every aid for which I can find law or constitutional power. Government that cannot give protection to the life, property, and all guaranteed civil rights (in this country the greatest is an untrammeled ballot) to the citizen is in so far a failure, and every energy of the oppressed should be exerted (always within the law, and by constitutional means) to regain lost privileges or protection. Too long denial of guaranteed rights is sure to lead to revolution, bloody revolution, where suffering must fall upon the guilty as well as the innocent. Expressing the hope that the better judgment and co-operation of the citizens of the State over which you have presided so ably may enable you to secure a fair trial and punishment of all offenders, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and without aid from the Federal Government, but with the promise of such aid on the conditions named in the foregoing, I subscribe myself, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT.

Hon. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor of South Carolina.

These words will live and command the respect of statesmen and philanthropists, but apologies for violence, and encouragment to offenders against the rights of men, can never be justified.

The marshals were instructed by the Attorney-General as follows:

"In this connection I advise that you and each of your deputies, general and 'special,' have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, 'every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, [whether of the State or of the United States,] under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus.' I prefer to quote the above statement of the law upon this point, from an opinion by my predecessor, Attorney-General Cushing, because it thus appears to have been well settled for many years." (6 Opinions, 466, May 27, 1854.)

The right thus to summon military officers of the State and the United States as a part of the civil posse comitatus is no new doctrine, but has been asserted heretofore.[21] country gives more than ordinary strength, and, therefore, requires the Government particularly to observe and provide against.

In this connection I advise that you and each of your deputies, general and "special," have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, "every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, [whether of the State or of the United States,] under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus." I prefer to quote the above statement of the law upon this point, from an opinion by my predecessor, Attorney-General Cushing, because it thus appears to have been well settled for many years. (6 Opinions, 466, Maay 27, 1854.)

I need hardly add that there can be no State law or State official in this country who has jurisdiction to oppose you in discharging your official duties under the laws of the United States. If such interference shall take place, a thing not anticipated, you are to disregard it entirely. The laws of the United States are supreme, and so, consequently, is the action of officials of the United States in enforcing them. There is, as virtually you have already been told, no officer of a State whom you may not by summons embody into your own posse, and any State posse already embodied by a sheriff will, with such sheriff, be obliged upon your summons to become part of a United States posse, and obey you or your deputy acting virtute officii.

The responsibility which devolves upon an officer clothed with such powers, and required to guard the highest right of citizens, corresponds in degree with those powers and rights, and exacts of such officer consideration, intelligence, and courage.

It is proper to advise you that in preparing this circular I have considered recent important judgments given by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the acts of Congress which regulate this general topic.

I have founded the above instructions upon those acts as affected by such judgments, and I need in this place add no more than that these judgments do not concern elections for Federal offices.

You will find appended, in full or by reference, such statutory provisions as it seems important that you and your deputies shall in this connection read and consider.

In matters of doubt you are of course entitled to the advice of the United States attorneys for your district.

These instructions have been submitted to the President, and have his approval.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Attorney-General.

See Revised Statutes, 2004-2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, 5505, 5507, 5508, 5407; also, Title XXVI, page 353, and Title LXX, page 1073.

The following was also issued to district attorneys in the Southern States:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, September 18, 1876.

SIR: On the 14th instant I transmitted for your information a circular recently forwarded to the marshal of your district.

You will regard it as in some degree addressed to yourself, and as calling attention to your own correlative official duties in regard to its subject-matter.

You will be expected heartily to co-operate in its purpose of preventing the application of illegal force to persons in their character of voters in elections for Federal officers. Such force is alike to be suppressed, whether those who practice it are private citizens or assume to be authorized by official power, be it State or national.

Enough has been said in the circular referred to as to such force in general, and in the same connection you will be especially careful that the marshal and his deputies are well informed of what is required by their duty, as well to the public as to the party arrested—both in making arrest, whether with or without process, and in dealing with such party after arrest.

Very respectfully,

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Attorney-General.

To ——— ———, Esq.,
United States Attorney for the District of ———.

---

[21] The Washington Star of September 7, 1876, published an official letter from Mr. Evarts, while Attorney-General, dated August, 1868, as follows:

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, August 20, 1868.

SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant reached me yesterday, and has received an attentive consideration. Colonel Sprague's information to you must have been based upon his own construction of General Meade's order, lately issued, and not upon any special instructions from the President to Colonel Sprague, through General Meade or otherwise, as no such special instructions have been issued by the President.

You add: "Under some circumstances I should be glad to have the aid of the military, and if practicable would be pleased to have instructions given to the military to aid me when necessary. I ask this, as Colonel Sprague informs me under his instructions he cannot do so."

The desire and request for the "aid of the military" under certain circumstances I understand to refer to the occasional necessity which may arise, that a marshal should have the means of obtaining the aid and attendance of a more considerable force than his regular deputies supply, for the execution of legal process in his district.

The twenty-seventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 established the office of marshal, and names among his duties and powers the following: "And to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States, and he shall have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty, and to appoint, as there may be occasion, one or more deputies." (1 Statute, page 87.)

You will observe from this that the only measure of the assistance which you have the power to command is its necessity for the execution of your duty, and upon your discreet judgment, under your official responsibility, the law reposes the determination of what force each particular necessity requires. This power of the marshal is equivalent to that of a sheriff, and, with either, embraces, as a resort in necessity, the whole power of the precinct (county or district) in which the officer's authority extends. In defining this power, Attorney-General Cushing, and, as I understand the subject, correctly, says it "comprises every person in the district or county above the age of fifteen years, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey the commands of a sheriff or marshal."

While, however, the law gives you this "power to command all necessary assistance," and the military within your district are not exempt from obligation to obey, in common with all citizens, your summons in cases of necessity, you will be particular to observe that this high and responsible authority is given to the marshal only in aid of his duty "to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him, and issued under the authority of the United States," and only in case of necessity for this extraordinary aid. The military persons obeying the summons of the marshal will act in subordination and obedience to the civil officer—the marshal—in whose aid, in the execution of process, they are called, and only to the effect of securing its execution.

This special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which under our Government belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States. Nor is this special duty and authority of the marshal, in executing process issued to him, to be confounded with the authority and duty of the President of the United States, in the specific cases of the Constitution and under the regulations of the statutes, to protect the States against domestic violence, or with his authority and duty under special statutes to employ military force in subduing combinations in resistance to the laws of the United States; for neither of these duties or authorities is shared by the subordinate officers of the Government, except when and as the same may be communicated to them by the President.

I have thus called your attention to the general considerations bearing upon the subject to which your letter refers for the purpose of securing a due observance of the limits of your duty and authority in connection therewith. Nothing can be less in accordance with the nature of our Government or the disposition of our people than a frequent and ready resort to military aid in execution of the duties confided to civil officers. Courage, vigor, and intrepidity are appropriate qualities for the civil service which the marshals of the United States are expected to perform, and a re-enforcement of their power by extraordinary means is permitted by the law only in extraordinary emergencies.

If it shall be thought that any occasion, at any time, exists for instructions to the military authorities of the United States, within any of the States, in connection with the execution of process of courts of the United States, those instructions will be in accordance with the exigency then appearing.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS,
Attorney-General.

ALEXANDER MACRUDER, Esq.,
United States Marshal Northern District, Saint Augustine, Florida.

And this demonstrates that even the soldiers may be, under proper circumstances, made subordinate to civil authority. Here, then, is authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States to require soldiers, when stationed in South Carolina, to aid the civil service.

And the President is fully authorized to station soldiers in such locality as he deems proper.

Congress has made it a penal offense for persons in the military service to interfere with voters or officers of election.[22]

Mr. Attorney-General Taft, in a speech at New York, October 25, 1876, commenting on his circular, said:

"Some complaints have been made of the order to the United States marshals. I have not thought it necessary to respond to the patriotic criticisms. Perhaps I have been under a hallucination in supposing it to be a very good order, and that it carried its justification on its face. It is clear that the order does not authorize or encourage marshals to interfere with any honest citizen while voting or performing any other duty. They are only to prevent unlawful breaches of the peace of the United States. They are not to intimidate any voter. They are to prevent intimidation. But political critics claim that the order conflicts with the recent decision of the Supreme Court and are concerned for the credit of the bar. If they had read the order and the decision they would have seen that there was no conflict. The case decided by the Supreme Court arose on an election of State officers only, and this order relates to the election of Federal officers only. Besides, the Supreme Court in its opinion, lest some ignorant or perverse man should misinterpret the opinion, went out of its way to say expressly that the decision had no bearing on the clause of the Constitution relating to election of members of Congress. The thirteenth amendment made slaves freemen; the fourteenth amendment made them citizens and gave them civil rights; the fifteenth amendment provided that no citizen should be denied the right to vote on count of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that Congress should have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. Congress passed an act which it was supposed would enforce this amendment. A case arose in Kentucky at an election of State officers only for denying the right to vote to a negro. The court held that the act of Congress as passed was not appropriate legislation for the premises of that suit. The reason can be concisely stated thus: Independent of the fifteenth amendment, Congress has nothing whatever to do with the election of State officers. By that amendment its only power is to prevent the denial to citizens of the right to vote, (on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude,) but this act provides a punishment for the denial of the right of voting to any citizen, white or black. This transcended the right of Congress as to State election, and was not, therefore, appropriate legislation. The act should not have been confined to a denial of the right of voting on account of race, &c.; but the court said that they were not considering the effect of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution as to election of Senators and Representatives. The effect of that section is to enable Congress to make or amend any or all regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress. These instructions relate to the election of Federal officers, the very thing which the Supreme Court say was not invoked in their decision of the Kentucky case.

"The order also says that 'the judgment of the Supreme Court did not concern Federal elections.' That looks reasonably plain. If any man fails to understand that, I commend him to the common-school system for further instructions. I cannot afford to spend any more time with him on the subject. But another critic is worried because the order includes the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President, and supposes that he has made a discovery when he finds that the State Legislature has the right to prescribe the manner of electing or appointing presidential electors. As members of Congress and presidential electors are by law elected at the same time and place, the election by law includes both, as stated in the order. It is wholly immaterial to a marshal what the State Legislature might do. It was the duty of the Attorney-General to instruct him what the law, under which he was to act, was. By the Constitution, Congress has power to prescribe the time, place, and manner for electing members of Congress, also to fix the time for the appointment of presidential electors. The State Legislature can fix the manner of appointing electors. Congress has by statute fixed the same day for the election of Congressmen and for the appointment of electors, and State Legislatures have fixed the same place and same manner, namely, 'by ballot at general elections.' In the present condition of legislation, therefore, as it is said by the order, the election at which members of the House of Representatives are chosen by law includes also a choice of electors for President and Vice-President, and the United States secures voters against whatever in general hinders or prevents them from a free exercise of the elective franchise, extending that case alike to the registration-lists, the act of voting, and personal freedom and security of the voter at all times, as well against violence on account of any vote that he may intend to give as against a conspiracy because of any that he may already have given. By section 5513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it is provided 'that every registration made under the laws of any State or Territory, for any State or other election at which such Representative or Delegate in Congress may be chosen, shall be deemed to be a registration within the meaning of the preceding section' [Notwithstanding such registration is also made for the purpose of any State, territorial, or municipal election.] The fact that Vermont, Maine, Ohio, and Indiana form an exception to the general rule as to the time when their elections of Representatives in Congress is held as immaterial. It in no wise impairs correctness or fullness of the order, which is an individual communication to each marshal, and was not intended for marshals of those four States, neither of which were supervisors or marshals employed at the elections.

"The instructions were intended to give to each marshal to whom it was addressed his duty under the laws as they existed then and there, when and where he was to enforce them. Congress enacted a law that all elections for Representatives in Congress, without exception, should be held 'on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November,' as it had the absolute right to do by the Constitution; but finding that these four States had got the time fixed differently by their State constitutions, and would be embarrassed if Congress insisted on uniformity as to them, an amendment was enacted at the next Congress relieving such States as could not conform to the day fixed by Congress without an amendment to their State constitutions. These four States thus form an exception. In all the rest the Representatives in Congress and the electors are chosen at the same time and place and in the same manner, and really at one and the same election, so far as registration and regulations of elections are concerned. The statute of New York expressly provides that they shall all be elected at the same general elections, and other States have similar provisions, excepting Colorado, which makes its first choice of electors by the Legislature; but these exceptions do not in any manner affect the principle of the order, as it was not intended for excepted States, as shown by the order itself, which confines its instructions to the elections to be held on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November next. It is not necessary to speak of the clause relating to the posse comitatus. It is too well settled for dispute. The order is not a military order; it does not assume to make any disposition of troops, but advises the marshal that if he has occasion to call out the posse, and soldiers are in his district, they may be embodied for the purpose. This was done when a master in pursuit of his fugitive slave resorted to civil process of the United States, and the marshal, meeting resistance, called on United States soldiers, and they came and assisted to arrest and return the slave to his owner. The present application of the principle is quite as legal and a good deal more humane."

[22] Revised Statutes, sections 5528–5537, 2003.

ELECTION OFFICERS AND VOTERS MAY BE PROTECTED BY MILITARY POWER.

But, as civil officers might in this form be powerless to keep the peace at elections, the Constitution and laws have regarded the elective franchise as of such inestimable value as to deserve, in those extreme cases where necessity requires it, military protection from the National Government. This will be clear from a brief statement. Congress, as already known, has power to make all proper regulations as to the elections of Representatives in Congress and authorize all acts "necessary and proper for that purpose."

The Constitution also declares that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."[23]

This he can only do by the defensive means placed by law in his hands.[24]

The act of Congress provides that—

"No * * * officer or person * * * in the military * * * service * * * shall have * * * any troops * * * at the place where any * * * election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls." (Revised Statutes, section 2002. For the statute of England on this subject see Congressional Record of January 17, 1877, Johnston's speech.)

From this an unequivocal inference arises, which is positive law, that the President, in executing the Constitution and those laws which give security to the right of voting for Representatives in Congress, may require the presence of troops "at the place where an election is held" in two cases: (1) when "necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States" and (2) "to keep the peace at the polls."

By statute, also, the President is authorized to employ the military power for the protection of the civil rights of citizens. (Revised Statutes, section 1989.)

Here, then, is AUTHORITY, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, for the use of troops to protect citizens in exercising the right of suffrage as stated.

There is also a duty to use military power in still other cases.

The Constitution provides that—

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

Here is a covenant for a duty which cannot in good faith be omitted.

Whenever there is "domestic violence," within the meaning of the Constitution and the proper demand is made by the governor of a State on the President for military aid, it cannot be refused. The character of the violence which justifies military interposition is well understood.[25]

Here, then, is AUTHORITY, under the Constitution, for the employment of troops of the United States on certain contingencies in a State.[26]

[24] 9 Opinions Attorney-General, 524

[26] The President's message of January 22, 1877, is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

On the 9th day of December, 1876, the following resolution of the House of Representatives was received, namely:

"Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to this House copies of any and all orders or directions, emanating from him or from either of the executive departments of the Government, to any military commander or civil officer, with reference to the service of the Army, or any portion thereof, in the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida since the 1st of August last, together with reports by telegraph or otherwise from either or any of said military commanders or civil officers."

It was immediately or soon thereafter referred to the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General, the custodians of all retained copies of "orders or directions" given by the Executive Department of the Government covered by the above inquiry, together with all information upon which such "orders or directions" were given.

The information, it will be observed, is voluminous, and, with the limited clerical force in the Department of Justice, has consumed the time up to the present. Many of the communications accompanying this have been already made public in connection with messages heretofore sent to Congress. This class of information includes the important documents received from the governor of South Carolina and sent to Congress with my message on the subject of the Hamburgh massacre; also the documents accompanying my response to the resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to the soldiers stationed at Petersburgh.

There have also come to me and to the Department of Justice, from time to time, other earnest written communications from persons holding public trusts and from others residing in the South, some of which I append hereto as bearing upon the precarious condition of the public peace in those States. These communications I have reason to regard as made by respectable and responsible men. Many of them deprecate the publication of their names as involving danger in them personally.

The reports heretofore made by committees of Congress of the results of their inquiries in Mississippi and in Louisiana, and the newspapers of several States recommending the "Mississippi plan," have also furnished important data for estimating the danger to the public peace and order in those States.

It is enough to say that these different kinds and sources of evidence have left no doubt whatever in my mind that intimidation has been used, and actual violence, to an extent requiring the aid of the United States Government, where it was practicable to furnish such aid, in South Carolina, in Florida, and in Louisiana, as well as in Mississippi, in Alabama, and in Georgia.

The troops of the United States have been but sparingly used, and in no case so as to interfere with the free exercise of the right of suffrage. Very few troops were available for the purpose of preventing or suppressing the violence and intimidation existing in the States above named. In no case, except that of South Carolina, was the number of soldiers in any State increased in anticipation of the election, saving that twenty-four men and an officer were sent from Fort Foote to Petersburgh, Virginia, where disturbances were threatened prior to the election.

No troops were stationed at the voting-places. In Florida and in Louisiana, respectively, the small number of soldiers already in the said States were stationed at such points in each State as were most threatened with violence, where they might be available as a posse for the officer whose duty it was to preserve the peace and prevent intimidation of voters. Such a disposition of the troops seemed to me reasonable and justified by law and precedent, while its omission would have been inconsistent with the constitutional duty of the President of the United States "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The statute expressly forbids the bringing of troops to the polls, "except where it is necessary to keep the peace," implying that to keep the peace it may be done. But this even, so far as I am advised, has not in any case been done. The stationing of a company, or a part of a company, in the vicinity, where they would be available, to prevent riot, has been the only use made of troops prior to and at the time of the elections. Where so stationed, they could be called in an emergency requiring it by a marshal or deputy marshal as a posse to aid in suppressing unlawful violence. The evidence which has come to me has left me no ground to doubt that if there had been more military force available it would have been my duty to dispose of it in several States with a view to the prevention of the violence and intimidation which have undoubtedly contributed to the defeat of the election law in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, as well as in South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida.

By article 4, section 4, of the Constitution, "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect

THE TROOPS ACTUALLY IN THE STATE.

In view of the authority thus given by the Constitution and laws, it will be proper next to show that a necessity existed during 1876 for the use of even more troops in South Carolina than were located or sent there, and that those sent were employed solely to protect citizens and official authority from overthrow, and in no case to invade or violate any right.

The State has thirty-two counties, with four hundred and ninety-one voting-precincts and polling-places. By the census of 1875 it had a total population of 925,145, including 110,744 colored and 74,199 white voters.[27] On the 30th September, 1876, there were in the State only 589 officers and soldiers of the United States, or one soldier for every 1,570 of the population. On the 7th of November, the day of election, the number of officers and soldiers were 1,526, or one for every 606 of the population. These were distributed in small squads at sixty-seven different places, at thirty-six of which the number did not exceed thirteen. Not one in seven of the voting-precincts had any soldiers therein. There were four hundred and twenty-four of the four hundred and ninety-one precincts without a soldier.[28]

each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

By act of Congress, (R. S. U. S., sections 1034-5,) the President, in case of "insurrection in any State," or of "unlawful obstruction to the enforcement of the laws of the United States by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings," or whenever "domestic violence in any State so obstructs the execution of the laws thereof and of the United States as to deprive any portion of the people of such State" of their civil or political rights, is authorized to employ such parts of the land and naval forces as he may deem necessary to enforce the execution of the laws and preserve the peace, and sustain the authority of the State and of the United States. Acting under this title (69) of the Revised Statutes of the United States I accompanied the sending of troops to South Carolina with a proclamation such as is therein prescribed.

The President is also authorized by act of Congress "to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States" * * * "as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and to enforce the due execution of the provisions" of title 24 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the protection of the civil rights of citizens, among which is the provision against conspiracies "to prevent, by force, intimidation, or threat, any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy in a legal manner toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for President or Vice-President, or as a member of Congress of the United States." (United States Revised Statutes, 1989.)

In cases falling under this title, I have not considered it necessary to issue a proclamation to precede or accompany the employment of such part of the Army as seemed to be necessary.

In case of insurrection against a State government or against the Government of the United States, a proclamation is appropriate; but in keeping the peace of the United States at an election at which members of Congress are elected, no such call from the State or proclamation by the President is prescribed by statute or required by precedent.

In the case of South Carolina, insurrection and domestic violence against the State government were clearly shown, and the application of the governor founded thereon was duly presented, and I could not deny his constitutional request without abandoning my duty as the Executive of the National Government.

The companies stationed in the other States have been employed to secure the better execution of the laws of the United States and to preserve the peace of the United States.

After the election had been had, and where violence was apprehended by which the returns from the counties and precincts might be destroyed, troops were ordered to the State of Florida, and those already in Louisiana were ordered to the points in greatest danger of violence.

I have not employed troops on slight occasions, nor in any case where it has not been necessary to the enforcement of the laws of the United States. In this I have been guided by the Constitution and the laws which have been enacted and the precedents which have been formed under it.

It has been necessary to employ troops occasionally to overcome resistance to the internal revenue laws from the time of the resistance to the collection of the whisky tax in Pennsylvania, under Washington, to the present time.

In 1854, when it was apprehended that resistance would be made in Boston to the seizure and return to his master of a fugitive slave, the troops there stationed were employed to enforce the master's right under the Constitution, and troops stationed at New York were ordered to be in readiness to go to Boston if it should prove to be necessary.

In 1859, when John Brown, with a small number of men, made his attack upon Harper's Ferry, the President ordered United States troops to assist in the apprehension and suppression of him and his party without a formal call of the Legislature or governor of Virginia and without proclamation of the President.

Without citing further instances in which the Executive has exercised his power as commander of the Army and Navy to prevent or suppress resistance to the laws of the United States, or where he has exercised like authority in obedience to a call from a State to suppress insurrection, I desire to assure both Congress and the country that it has been my purpose to administer the executive power of the Government fairly, and in no instance to disregard or transcend the limits of the Constitution.

THE NECESSITY FOR TROOPS.

At the general election in November, 1874, D. H. Chamberlain, a republican, was elected governor for a term of two years, and soon after entered upon the duties of the office. The State officers were republican, and in a majority of the counties the county officers were of the same political faith. The Legislature was republican. The colored voters of the State were nearly all republican; the whites were very generally democrats.

Whatever may be said of prior administrations, that of Governor Chamberlain was eminently honest, wise, and successful. It reformed abuses, made merit the test for appointments to office, cut down expenses, reduced taxes, maintained the credit of the State, and a continuance of this administration, properly supported, will undoubtedly do much to restore public order, to revive the industries of the State, and secure the rights of person and property.[29]

E. D. TOWNSEND
Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 6, 1877.

[29] This is shown in the evidence. It will appear also from the following:

GOVERNOR CHAMBERLAIN'S ADMINISTRATION FROM 1874 TO 1876—REVIEW OF LAST TWO YEARS.

I was nominated and elected in 1874 as the candidate of the republican party, under pledges, both personal and party, to reform the abuses which then existed. In my inaugural address I developed in detail my plans of reform—plans which met the earnest approval of the general public of the State without regard to party. That I pursued the course there marked out earnestly and faithfully is a claim which cannot be successfully or even plausibly disputed. I found a considerable part of my own party opposed to my course, and thus my fidelity to my pledges and to the cause of reform, as I understood it, was put to severe and unexpected tests. It is not egotism but truth which leads me to affirm that I bore those tests in a manner which commanded the praise of the friends of reform throughout the State. The press of this State, the public utterances of its leading citizens, every organ of public opinion, will furnish the proof of this assertion. My record as governor was elaborately reviewed in July last by the Charleston News and Courier—beyond comparison the ablest, and, in a normal condition of affairs, the most liberal democratic newspaper in this State or in the South—in a series of editorial articles founded on official and indisputable records. From the closing article of this series, entitled "The Record of Governor Chamberlain—a Summary," I make the following extracts:

"We have scrutinized, one by one, the most important pledges and recommendations contained in the addresses and messages since his election, and we now briefly sum up the result of the investigation we have made:

* * * * * * *

"The abuse of the pardoning power has been corrected.

"The character of the officers of the government appointed by the executive has been improved, and the sureties upon the bonds of public officers have been required to make affidavits of their ability to meet the liability they assume.

"The settlement of the public debt has been maintained unchanged, and faith with the public creditor, so far as depended on executive and legislative action, has been fully kept.

"The effort to place the whole of the public funds in two banks of small capital was frustrated, and the State so saved from the danger of far greater loss than was sustained by the failure of the Solomon bank.

"The floating indebtedness of the State has been provided for in such a way that the rejecting of fraudulent claims is assured; the recognized and valid claims are scaled one-half the amount, and their payment is distributed over a term of four years, resulting in a saving to the State of at least $400,000.

"The tax laws have been amended so as to secure substantial unanimity and equality in the assessment of property for taxation.

"The contingent funds of the executive department have been so reduced in

The material portions of the republican "platform" for 1876 were as follows:

"The republican platform.—In preparing the platform of our party, I was invited by the committee having the work in charge to meet the committee and to present my views. I accepted this invitation, and I here present those portions of the platform adopted by the convention to which my efforts were especially directed:

"'4. That in presenting to the people of South Carolina our nominees for the high offices of the State for the coming two years, we believe we should make plain and unmistakable the aims and principles to which we stand pledged, in the event of their election; not in glittering generalities of reform, but in specific and substantial articles.'

"'6. We pledge ourselves to thorough reform in all departments of the State government where abuses shall be found to exist, and, as an earnest of the same, declare our purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of the State the following specific reforms as amendments to the State constitution:

"'"1. That the present adjustment of the bonded debt of the State shall be inviolable.

"'"2. That the General Assembly shall meet only once in every two years, and that the length of no session thereof shall exceed seventy days.

"'"3. That the number of sessions of courts of general sessions and common pleas shall be reduced to two annually in each county, with power reserved to the judges to call special sessions when necessary.

"'"4. That the veto power of the governor shall be so modified as to allow of the disapproval of a part without effect upon the rest of an act.

"'"5. That agricultural interests shall be relieved from burdensome taxation by a more equitable distribution of taxes and by the inauguration of a system of licenses fixed upon fair principles.

"'"6. That no public funds shall ever be used for the support of sectarian institutions.

"'"7. That the enormous evil of local and special legislation shall be prohibited whenever private interests can be protected under general laws.

"'"8. And inasmuch as the system of free schools was created in the State by the republican party, and should be especially fostered and protected by it, we pledge ourselves to the support of the amendment to the State constitution, now before the people, establishing a permanent tax for the support of free schools and preventing the removal of school funds from the counties where raised."

"'7. We pledge ourselves and the nominees of the republican party of the State to the securing of the following purposes by legislative enactment:

"'"1. The further and lowest reduction of salaries of all public servants, consistent with the necessities of government.

"'"2. The reduction of fees and costs, especially of attorneys in civil cases, and the amendment of the laws governing the settlement of estates in such manner as to secure a more economical administration and settlement of small estates.

"'"3. The immediate repeal of the agricultural lien-law.

"'"4. Public printing to be reduced at least one-third of the present appropriation.

"'"5. Convict labor to be utilized under such laws as shall secure humane treatment and the support of convicts without needless expense to the State.

"'"6. The annual appropriations for public institutions to be economically made and properly expended.

"'"7. The number of trial justices to be reduced throughout the State, and each justice to be assigned to specific territory, with moderate salaries, to cover costs of criminal business, adjusted in proportion to populations."

"'8. Recognizing the enormous expense of fencing farms and the scarcity of timber in some sections of the State, we feel it to be necessary that practical relief be afforded to the people of the State, and we pledge ourselves to secure such legislation upon the subject as will give to the electors of each county the right to regulate this question for themselves.'" (See Evidence, page 355.)

Up to August, 1876, when the democratic State convention was held, it had received the general approval of a large portion of the leading and better class of democrats of the State.[30] amount that the saving in two years, upon the basis of the average of six previous years, is $101 200.

"Legislative expenses, in like manner, and upon a similar basis, have been so reduced as to save the people, in two years, $350.810.

"Legislative contingent expenses in the same way have been so reduced as to save the State $33[illegible],000.

"In the expenditure of contingent funds accountability and publicity have been secured.

"The cost of public printing has been reduced from an annual average of $306,[illegible]09 to $50,000, saving in two years $512,418. The salaries of public officers have been reduced $30.000 a year.

"The tax levy for the current year for State purposes has been reduced from 13½ mills to 11 mills, a saving to the people this year of $[illegible]00,000.

"The deficiencies (including the losses by the Solomon bank) are, for the year 1874–'75, $30[illegible],872, which is $291,021 less than the deficiencies of 1872–'73 and $233,315 less than the deficiencies of 1873–'74.

"Under the several heads the savings that have actually been made are:

"In the bonanza bill	$400, 000
"In the executive contingent fund	101, 260
"In legislative expenses	350, 810
"In contingent expenses	355, 000
"In public printing	512, 418
"Total	1, 719, 488

"To realize this amount would require a tax of nearly 1½ per cent. Had the appropriations of the past two years been as inordinate as the average of the appropriations and expenditures of the preceding years, the State taxes of the past two years would have been ½ per cent. a year more than the outrageous rate actually levied.

"This is the record of Governor Chamberlain as shown by hard figures and unmistakable facts. We have strained or exaggerated nothing. The plain truth, as we know it, has been faithfully given. And we maintain that the record, as it stands, is one of which Governor Chamberlain has cause to be proud, that it justifies the support which has been given him, and is a complete answer to those of our friends who think that no act of Governor Chamberlain deserves public commendation but his refusal to issue the commissions to Whipper and Moses. That bold act, applauded everywhere in South Carolina, has not been mentioned in these articles."

[30] This is shown in the evidence. It will appear also from the following:

[From the Columbia, South Carolina, Union and Herald, (republican,) November 1, 1876.]

SOME DEMOCRATIC OPINIONS—IS IT REFORM THEY WANT?

Let dispassionate men read what the democratic organs of public opinion said of Governor Chamberlain and his administration of the office of governor within a few months. Let them ask, "What has he done since to make these same organs teem with denunciations of him?" They have but one reply. There is but one reply. He has denounced the killing of black men as murder. He has sought to bring the criminals who have committed deeds of blood to justice. He has put himself in the way of the plot to overawe and coerce the majority of the people. He has stood firmly by the rights of all the people. He has refused to shut his eyes to the shotgun campaign and its purposes. He has refused to be a traitor to the principle of a free ballot. He is true to the great national union republican party. He cannot be seduced or frightened into giving aid or comfort to the reactionary, violent, revolutionary, rebel democracy, as typified by Butler, Gary, Haskell, Lipscombe, Moise, Speights, Rhett, &c. These are his crimes, and these only.

He has fought a good fight in behalf of the people. (Yorkville Enquirer, May, 1875.)

We think its counsel noble and its spirit earnest. (Lexington Dispatch, January, 1875.)

It would be folly to run a democratic candidate for governor against Mr. Chamberlain. (News and Courier, July, 1876.)

Mr. Chamberlain has earned the gratitude and deserves the confidence of the whole people. (News and Courier.)

We hope that General Hampton will not be nominated, because we do not believe it possible to elect him. (News and Courier, July, 1876.)

Governor Chamberlain is a necessity. He alone in the State has power at present to check frauds, foster honesty, and restore order out of chaos. (Winnsborough News, June, 1875.)

The movement to organize the democratic party in this State was "mainly confined to a few leaders who want office themselves." (Sumter Watchman, [democratic,] June, 1876.)

Our very heart yearns over the strong conviction that accords with all reason and all the fight before us, that General Hampton is about be sacrificed. (Sumter Watchman.)

I honestly believe that Governor Chamberlain can do more for South Carolina in and out of the State than any other man. (Letter of George W. Williams, July, 1876.)

By supporting Mr. Chamberlain, the whole country will secure, without revolution, a government in every way satisfactory. (News and Courier, June, 1876.)

Governor Chamberlain is every day fulfilling the pledges made alike to conservatives and republicans in this campaign. (The Grange, January, 1875.)

The democrats in South Carolina are in the minority, else they could and would as a party, obtain control of the State by their own efforts. (News and Courier July, 1876.)

The most influential bankers and merchants in Charleston hold substantially the same opinions as those expressed by Mr. Williams. (News and Courier, July, 1875.)

The course of Governor Chamberlain, we think, commends itself to the cordial support of all the friends of good government in the State. (Abbeville Press, August, 1875.)

There would be more wisdom in co-operating with the friends of Governor Chamberlain to secure his election than in throwing away strength upon impossible candidates. (Clarendon Press, February, 1876.)

Being the ablest and purest man in the dominant party, he has become a necessity to the welfare of the State, and it behooves all good citizens to stand by him while he seeks to secure for them good government. (Camden Journal, August, 1875.)

We can't say hard things against Chamberlain, who is manifestly striving to give our impoverished people an honest government. That is what they want. Give it to them, and everything else—low taxes and prosperity—will follow. (Marion Star, 1876.)

If General Kershaw or General Hampton had been governor for the past two years neither of them could have effected as much reform or benefited the State as much as Governor Chamberlain has done. (Interview of Judge Maher in News and Courier, July, 1876.)

All good citizens will labor with the governor to hasten the coming of that auspicious day which shall find "all our people so united in the regard for the public weal that the advent to power of any political party shall not endanger the liberties or the material interests of any class of our fellow-citizens." (Yorkville Enquirer, January, 1875.)

While with the advent of Governor Chamberlain's administration our people begin to feel that a new and brighter era is dawning upon the State, it is gratifying to note that for the first time since reconstruction our State government is honorably recognized abroad and commanding respectful attention. (Yorkville Enquirer, January, 1875.)

He has accomplished such a Herculean task in breaking down the barriers of corruption and fraud, and gives such promise of being able ultimately to storm and carry the very citadel itself, that we take pleasure in writing him down a model governor. (Charlotte Observer, June, 1875.)

As we have already said, there is nothing but defeat ahead of us on any ticket of that sort that can be put forth. The name of General Hampton is electric and will thrill through the nerves of every white man in South Carolina; but what of that? If every one of them voted for him, and ten thousand more besides, he would be still in a hopeless minority. (Marlboro' Planter, August, 1875.)

'Tis a pleasure, no less than a duty, to recognize the just, economical and sagacious purpose of Governor Chamberlain in the advice communicated by him in the letter addressed to the State senate committee on finance. * * * The country is conscious that there is a steady hand at the helm of State affairs, and feels a renewal and an increase of confidence in the pilot. (Phœnix, February, 1875.)

He was brave to a fault and earnest to the verge of indiscretion. (News and Courier, January, 1876.)

With equal earnestness he exerted the whole power and influence of his office to promote the public good. (News and Courier, July, 1876.)

Time has justified us, as it will justify Mr Chamberlain. Time has shown that whoever else goes back he will move steadily forward. (News and Courier, January, 1876.)

God forbid that this old element should ever get into power again. It led us to the devil once, and would likely do so again. ("Paysan," in letter to News and Courier, July, 1876.)

We believe that, without regard to the consequences to himself or to his party, he will go on to the end in the narrow path of right. (News and Courier, February, 1876.)

A full democratic vote cannot be polled against Governor Chamberlain. It is certainly not worth while to be beaten anywhere in order to ascertain how weak we are. (News and Courier, August, 1876.)

The Charleston democracy are determined to stand squarely by Governor Chamberlain in the fight that his effort to secure reform has brought upon him. (News and Courier, December, 1875.)

That Governor Chamberlain, from his inaugural address to his last veto, has carried out every pledge of the platform on which he was elected. (Resolution of Mr. Aldrich, January, 1876.)

Governor Chamberlain stands erect, bearing the wrath of his own party, to maintain unbroken his pledges of reform. As he is true to his duty, let us be true to

---

Many of the democrats favored the idea of making no nomination against Governor Chamberlain for the election in November, 1876. Other counsels, however, prevailed, and a State democratic convention, held on the 16th of August, 1876, nominated General Wade Hampton as the democratic candidate for governor, with a full State ticket.

The republican State convention, on the 12th of September, 1876, renominated Governor Chamberlain for governor, with a full State ticket.

The two political parties nominated candidates in the several districts and counties of the State for State senators, representatives in the General Assembly, and county officers.

Ever since the close of the war the State has been republican by a decided majority.

ours, and stand firmly and unitedly by him in support of the right. (Speech of General Conner, December, 1875.)

There must be no mental reservations when we say we will stand by Governor Chamberlain. We mean it as our fathers meant it when they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. (Speech of Colonel Pressley, December, 1875.)

I believe that a stronger fight can be made next fall for good government in South Carolina than has been made since the war, and I believe it can be done by supporting Governor Chamberlain in his efforts for reform. (Anderson Intelligencer, April, 1876.)

Let others say what they may and seek to impress the popular judgment as they can, as for the intelligent popular sentiment of Abbeville County, without reference to party, the indorsement of Governor Chamberlain is hearty and emphatic. (Abbeville Medium, November, 1875.)

While the governor does not abate one jot or tittle of his party fealty, he will not support any measure or policy that does not tend to advance the interest of South Carolina. This is true statesmanship, and is all that we need to redeem the State. (Barnwell Sentinel, November, 1875.)

There are hundreds on hundreds of the white people of the State who would vote for Governor Chamberlain for re-election against any nomination which could be made. This we know, because we hear it from the lips of the people day by day. (Sumter Watchman, April, 1876.)

In South Carolina the conspicuous * * in the fight for reform, the one man who has made reform at an early day a possibility, is Governor Chamberlain, whose election was the greatest blessing in disguise that this people has known. (News and Courier, January, 1876.)

The conservative citizens of Charleston promise Governor Chamberlain their steadfast support. This they owe to the man who stands like a granite wall between an oppressed people and those who seek by foul means to rob them of their lives, liberties, and homes. (News and Courier, December, 1875.)

Governor D. H. Chamberlain has illustrated by his conduct the noble ends which may be achieved by a stranger who differs from many of us in matters of political faith, but who unites with good men of all views in measures of earnest reform; and this people will sustain him to the end. (Resolution at Sumter meeting, January, 1876.)

We have to thank God that our candidate for governor was not elected, for, with all the acknowledged modesty, ability, and learning of Judge Green, I doubt if he had the backbone to stand up for right in such an issue as this with that resolute firmness which Governor Chamberlain has displayed. (Moise, in speech at Sumter.)

That we heartily indorse Governor Chamberlain in his efforts to redeem the State from plunder and degradation, and while he has been faithful to his own party he has also been faithful to ours, and we hereby pledge ourselves to stand by and support him promptly, faithfully, fearlessly, and defiantly. (Resolutions at Barnwell meeting, January, 1876.)

Let honor be awarded to him who is deserving of praise. Certainly the gratitude of the State of South Carolina is now due to her governor, Hon. D. H. Chamberlain. By his wise and patriotic course he is fast gaining the admiration and esteem of the law-abiding and liberty-loving throughout the Union. (Charlotte Observer, December, 1875.)

Governor Chamberlain stands upon the right. His sole guide is his public duty, and whoever else may be against him, the true people of the State, whose champion he is in the hour of their sorest need, will stand by him to the end. Governor Chamberlain has done for the people of South Carolina what no other living man could have done. Great was his opportunity, and splendid is the use he has made of it. (News and Courier, December, 1875.)

Governor Chamberlain, we feel constrained to say, has planted his foot firmly on the highest round of virtuous fame. His brave and superb conduct in the very pinch of the emergency has won for him a historic fame outside of all party lines and above cavil or dispute. He stands now in the calm attitude of a man in a higher atmosphere than those miserable men who would hawk at and hound him down. (Greenville News, December, 1875.)

In the eyes of the State and of the nation Governor Chamberlain, an avowed and thorough republican, arises before us as the champion around whom, from center to circumference, clusters our hope. * * * No man now living in the State embodies in his individual person so much power and influence on the side of good government. If the incentive be to reform our State government, then Governor Chamberlain is certainly the man who seems to have been providentially brought forward to our help. (Sumter Watchman, February, 1876.)

No mortal man, with all the surroundings that environed Governor Chamberlain when he took the executive chair, could have done more for the good of the State than he has done. His history as governor has been pure, unspotted, and unstained. (Horry News, September, 1875.)

Far from bringing out a full vote, the "straight-out" policy will, in our opinion, cause thousands of whites to cast their votes for the republican candidate, if that candidate be Mr. Chamberlain, or refrain from voting for democrats, because they know there is no hope for victory. (News and Courier, July, 1876.)

In two years we hope and believe his administration will be such as to render the white people of the State the strongest supporters of Governor Chamberlain. Our people only want a wise, just, and economical government, and this, I believe, he will endeavor to inaugurate. (Correspondence of Keowee Courier, January, 1875.)

Governor Chamberlain richly deserves the confidence of the people of this State. The people of South Carolina, who have all at stake, who see and hear what persons outside of the State cannot know, are satisfied with Governor Chamberlain's honesty. They believe in him, as well they may. (News and Courier, May, 1875.)

Mr. Chamberlain will accept a nomination for re-election, not because of the emoluments of the office, which are pitiful; nor for the love of politics, which are not to his taste, but because in two years more, with a sound, intelligent, and upright legislature, he can, with the knowledge he has of our condition and wants, complete the work now begun, and make South Carolina as contented and progressively prosperous as any State in the South. (News and Courier, August, 1876.)

The interchange of courtesies between Governor Chamberlain and General Kershaw on Wednesday must have been exceedingly pleasant, and General Kershaw never represented the popular sentiment more correctly than when he said that "no one would give Governor Chamberlain a more cordial and hearty support than he in his efforts to effect reforms in the administation of the affairs of the State government." This is the feeling undoubtedly of nine-tenths of the white citizens of the State. (News and Courier.)

We are happy to unite with others in the most hearty approval of the general contents of the message, and rejoice to see in it a fulfillment so far of the pledges made by the governor in his inaugural, which were in fact, only a vindication of those made during the canvass.

We rejoice at the fine opportunity afforded by Governor Chamberlain to prove to the world that southern gentlemen are not capable of the folly of proscription and oppression to men for mere opinions and politics. (Greenville Enterprise and Mountaineer, January, 1875.)

4th. We tender to Governor Chamberlain our grateful thanks for the bold and statesmanlike struggle he has made in the cause of reform and the economical administration of the government in the preservation of the public faith, in the equal administration of justice, and in the maintenance of the public peace, and we pledge him our cordial support for the accomplishment of these ends. (Presented by General Conner. (Charleston resolutions, December, 1875.)

The brave words of the governor in reproof of extravagance, in exposition of the absolute necessity of curtailing the expense, will live and be admired beyond the era and the occasion which gave them origin.

At the close of this first session of the Legislature we take pleasure in saying to him, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

The honest men of all parties look upon him to-day as a governor whose administration has been bold, honest, and exceptionally able, and who is now the main bulwark that protects the State from further spoliation and fraud. (News and Courier, April, 1875.)

We would like to be convinced that we are wrong, but until this is done, until some one shows us how 30,000 republican majority, with a leader like Governor Chamberlain in command, can be wiped out at the polls, we shall not draw our support from him who, by his many official acts, has satisfied us that he is doing the best he possibly can do with the material he has—and much better than any democrat in the State could do with the same material—to give us what we want for ourselves and our families. (Marion Star, June, 1876.)

Governor Chamberlain will carry a majority of the better elements of his party on an advancing platform of reform. For the democrats to oppose this would be throwing away their opportunity, if the idea be to reform the government. In the face of such facts and such a situation a straight-out ticket would be but courting defeat, as the republican ranks would be inevitably driven together. And then there are hundreds on hundreds of white people of the State who would vote for Governor Chamberlain for re-election against any nomination that could be made. (Sumter Watchman, August, 1876.)

Mr. Chamberlain will probably be the candidate of the republican party for re-election. The wilder the talk of the radical democracy the greater is his strength as a commanding necessity to his party. In case that he be nominated, he will have the undivided support of the radicals. There will be no bolt. Add to the solid republican vote the power to obtain Federal troops as they may be needed, the executive appointment of commissioners of election, the broad and undefined powers of the board of State canvassers, and what prospect is there that he could be defeated? It could be done in only one way—by armed force. For that the people are not ready, and, if they were ready, such a course would end in disaster and ruin. (News and Courier, July, 1876.)

No man who did not have a clear head, a brave heart, and an honest purpose could give expression to such lofty words of patriotism and duty. * * * The garb of the carpet-bagger dropped from his shoulders; he was received with affection as an adopted son into the family of the children of the Palmetto State, and his name was enrolled with Blanding and Nott and Duncan and the hundreds of New Englanders who have adorned her society and illustrated her history, and the name of Chamberlain will stand high on that roll, for his burning words will go down to posterity and make a shining page in history as Pinckney's "Millions for defense, not a cent for tribute;" or the old dictator's "By God, I will cut my right hand off before I sign the order;" or Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty or give me death." (Speech of Judge Aldrich, at Barnwell, January, 1876.)

Both democrats and republicans opposed Mr. Chamberlain until he had shown that no democrat or republican in his position could go further than he would go in advocating and working for economy, purity, and low taxation. (News and Courier, April, 1876.)

GEORGE W. WILLIAMS DECLINES.

MOUNTAIN HOME, NACOOCHEE, GEORGIA,
July 28, 1876.

To the editor of the News and Courier:

Having received numerous inquiries desiring to know whether I would accept a nomination for governor of South Carolina, I beg leave to say to my friends that I have no political aspirations, and would not exchange the independent life of a civilian for the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States.

In my judgment the democratic party ought not to make a nomination for governor. We are not in a condition to enter into an excited political contest.

I honestly believe that Governor Chamberlain can do more for South Carolina, in and out of the State, than any other man.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEO. W. WILLIAMS.

"As a fair statement of the objects of these organizations, as well as the testimony of an experienced and well-known observer in the South, I present an extract from a letter of H. V. Redfield, published in the Cincinnati Commercial, and reproduced in the Charleston News and Courier of September 19:

"'TRUE INWARDNESS.

"'The outsider is apt to be puzzled by accounts of affairs here. He may not un-essary for the governor to issue a proclamation requiring them "To abstain from all unlawful interference with the rights of citizens, and from all violations of the public peace."

This proclamation by the governor, dated October 7, 1876, recites that it was made known[34] "by written and sworn evidence, that there exists such unlawful obstructions, combinations, and assemblages of persons * * * that it has become impracticable, in my judgment, as governor of the State, to enforce by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings the laws of the State, within said counties; by reason whereof it has become necessary, in my judgment, as governor, to call forth and employ the military force of the State to enforce the faithful execution of the laws."[35]

These military organizations and their members executed their purpose in various forms, prominent among which were these:

I. By breaking up or disturbing republican political meetings, assembled for political discussion, and by preventing citizens from attending them.

II. By proscription or violence in various forms, as—

1. By land-owners notifying lessees to leave their premises in case the latter should vote the republican ticket.
2. By employers giving notice of a refusal to continue employment.
3. By notice of a withdrawal of patronage.
4. By social ostracism.
5. By displays of armed force and threats of personal violence by day and by night.
6. By firing upon the buildings of colored people by night.
7. By individual murders.
8. By wholesale massacre, riot, and bloodshed.
9. By intimidation and violence affecting the election, and at the polls on the day of election.

To these were added, after the election, an attempt to bribe[36] one of the republican electors to vote for Tilden for President, and a general determination to prevent the republican State officers elected, notwithstanding all these forms of terror, from obtaining possession of these offices, and finally resistance when they did.[37]

It was not possible for the minority of the committee to take testimony in detail as to all these, but sufficient appears to show the facts as stated. The proof is abundant and convincing. Attention will be called to some of the proofs.

WHITE PEOPLE PROPERTY-OWNERS, COLORED PEOPLE LESSEES AND EMPLOYÉS. COLORED PEOPLE ORDERLY AND UNARMED; THE DEMOCRATS ARMED.

Before doing so it may be proper to say the wealth and property of the State is generally owned by the white citizens. The colored people, so recently emerged from slavery, are almost entirely dependent on the land-owners for the means of subsistence by renting lands. Agriculture is the leading and almost exclusive industry of the State.

So far as there are other industries, the white people are generally the employers; the colored are the employed.

From this it will be seen how entirely dependent is the unfortunate and persecuted colored race upon the more fortunate white citizens.

The colored people are quiet, orderly, law-abiding generally, without malice for the wrongs they have suffered, and anxious to improve their condition, educate their children, and withal they are earnest republicans. They have stood by their principles with a courage, fidelity, and heroism worthy of commendation and imitation. They have always been loyal to the Government even in its darkest days, and when the more favored white people of the State were in the confederate service, or giving it their material and moral support.

General James Conner, an able and prominent lawyer of Charleston, the democratic candidate for attorney-general, testified before the committee as to the character of the colored people as follows:

Question. What is the character of the colored people of this State generally? Are they a timid people, inclined to be alarmed at a show of violence?

Answer. It would depend altogether on whether they were excited or not; * * * in their ordinary normal condition they are quiet and peaceful, not disposed to disturbance at all.

Q. They are not what would be called a malicious people?

A. O, no.

Q. Quiet generally, and inoffensive?

A. Quiet and inoffensive, but at the same time they are inflammable and excitable and can be led off into anything.

* * * * * * *

As a general thing I would say that they are a peaceable, quiet, orderly population, but that they are excitable, inflammable, and when they do become excited they do not reason at all.

Q. They are not a people who are inclined to originate difficulties?

A. No; I should say not when left to themselves.

General WADE HAMPTON, the democratic candidate for governor, testified as follows:

Question. Are not the white men of this State a remarkably courageous and bold people?

Answer. I think they are as much so as people ordinarily are.

Q. Are they not almost universally a people who are not easily affected by intimidation or threats?

A. Yes; I think they are.

Q. Are not the colored people of this State much more liable to be affected by intimidation or threats, or a display of force?

A. Yes; I think that, as a general proposition, they would be.

General M. C. BUTLER testified as follows:

Question. Are not the colored men, as a general rule, timid and easily alarmed?

Answer. Some of them are and some are not.

Q. Are they not so as a general rule?

A. I think that as a race they are timid.

The colored people of the State are generally without arms or offensive weapons, while, as we have seen, the democratic voters were generally armed.

I.—DISTURBANCE OF REPUBLICAN MEETINGS—MEETINGS BROKEN UP OR PREVENTED FROM BEING HELD.[38]

It will be sufficient to present a description of one republican meeting as a fair specimen of many.

Governor Chamberlain describes the meeting at Edgefield thus:

"I went, on the 12th of August, to address a republican meeting at Edgefield Court-House. This meeting had been called by the chairman of the republican party of that county, at my instance. I invited one or two republican speakers to accompany me. Hon. ROBERT SMALLS, member of Congress from that district, also accompanied me. We reached the court-house at nine o'clock in the forenoon. Almost immediately upon my arrival I found the town rapidly filling with mounted white men, who signalized their arrival in town by riding rapidly through the streets and uttering almost continuously the shout or cry which you must pardon me for describing by its familiar name as the "rebel yell," a sound to which my ears were well accustomed in Virginia twelve years ago. By eleven o'clock this crowd of mounted white men numbered, I judge, five or six hundred at least. Command of these men was apparently formally assumed at the public square by General M. C. Butler and General M. W. Gary, and they proceeded to the grove, where a stand had been erected by the republican committee for the speakers. At about ten o'clock several white gentlemen had called at my hotel and asked that democratic speakers should be heard at our meeting. I answered that we had several republican speakers present who would require the whole day if they all spoke, but I suggested that these gentlemen should see the republican county chairman, and stated that I would personally consent to any arrangement they might make with him. The chairman, being engaged in preparations for the meeting, did not meet these gentlemen, and no arrangement was made.

"At eleven o'clock I left the hotel and proceeded to the grove. On arriving I found the mounted white men who had assembled in town, with a large number of other white men, occupying one entire half of the space around the stand, and one end of the stand already broken down by the white men who had crowded upon it. I stepped upon the stand in company with Judge Mackey and Senator Cain, the republican county chairman. Simultaneously General Butler and General Gary mounted the stand with a number of their followers. The white men vociferously cheered General Butler and General Gary as they appeared upon the stand, and the speaking was actually opened by General Butler, who returned his thanks to his followers for their presence and their tribute to him. He was followed, in response to deafening calls from his party, by General Gary, who announced in emphatic and plain terms that they—he and his party—had come there to be heard, and that they should be heard; that the radical leaders had failed to make any arrangement for a division of the time in speaking, but that he and his friends should be heard, with or without our consent, and he added, with great significance of tone and manner, that 'if any trouble took place in consequence, the reponsibility and consequences would be upon the radical leaders.' During all this time no republican had been allowed to speak. A glance at the crowd of white men who by this time covered the stand and swarmed around nearly three sides of it, besides climbing into the trees above our heads, all, so far as I could observe, HEAVILY ARMED WITH PISTOLS, DISPLAYED IN MANY INSTANCES on the front of their persons, and even HELD IN THEIR HANDS, convinced me that any attempt to refuse the demand made, or even to abandon the meeting, would result in collision and bloodshed between the parties. I therefore advised Senator Cain that we had no alternative but to yield to the de-derstand the formation of rifle clubs, rifle teams, artillery companies, among the whites. What are they afraid of? They are not afraid of anything. Why, then, this arming? They intend to carry this election, if it is possible to do so. The programme to have rifle clubs all over the State, and, while avoiding actual bloodshed as much as possible, to so impress the blacks that they, or a number of them, will feel impelled to vote with the whites out of actual fear. The blacks are timid by nature, timid by habit, timid by education. A display of force unnerves them. The whites understand this, and an immense marching about at night, and appearance at any republican meeting 'to divide time' is with a view to impress the blacks with a sense of danger of longer holding out against white rule. Add to the number they can scare the number they can buy, and they hope to have enough, united with the solid white vote, to gain the day, elect Hampton, and secure the Legislature.'"

It is shown by Senate Executive Document No. 85, first session Forty-fourth Congress.

It is shown by evidence on file in the executive office at Columbia, a part of which is annexed hereto as appendixes B, C, D.

The President's proclamation was as follows:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it has been satisfactorily shown to me that insurrection and domestic violence exist in several counties of the State of South Carolina, and that certain combinations of men against law exist in many counties of said State, known as "rifle clubs," who ride up and down by day and night in arms, murdering some peaceable citizens and intimidating others, which combinations, though forbidden by the laws of the State, cannot be controlled or suppressed by the ordinary course of justice;

And whereas it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the United States shall protect every state in this Union, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence;

And whereas by laws in pursuance of the above it is provided (in the laws of the United States) that in all cases of insurrection in any State (or of obstruction to the laws thereof) it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth the militia of any other State or States, or to employ such part of the land and naval forces as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection or causing the laws to be duly executed.

And whereas the Legislature of said State is not now in session and cannot be convened in time to meet the present emergency, and the executive of said State, under section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has therefore made due application to me in the premises for such part of the military force of the United States as may be necessary and adequate to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence, and to enforce the due execution of the laws;

And whereas it is required that, whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force for the purpose aforesaid, he shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective homes within a limited time:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation, and command all persons engaged in said unlawful and insurrectionary proceedings to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within three days from this date, and hereafter abandon said combinations and submit themselves to the laws and constituted authorities of said State.

And I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens thereof to uphold the laws and preserve the public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 17th day of October, A. D. 1876, and of the Independence of the United States one hundred and one.

JOHN L. CADWALADER,
Acting Secretary of State.

mand, and after a moment's consultation I announced that we would divide the time, giving a half hour each to three speakers from each party.

"Senator Cain then proposed to call the meeting to order, and to announce the speakers, but General Gary declared that they wanted no chairman, and accordingly I stepped forward, under these circumstances, to address the meeting. From the beginning to the end of my half hour I was interrupted by the crowd of white men with jeers and insults of every kind. Twice during my remarks the confusion and interruption were so complete that, after vainly appealing to the crowd to allow me to be heard, General Butler had the decency to come forward and so far restore order as to barely permit me to resume my remarks. Of the whole half hour allotted to me I certainly was not permitted to occupy over twenty minutes with any remarks such as I should naturally have made on such an occasion. In truth, I spoke under great constraint, and a consciousness that any word might precipitate a bloody collision, which I had no means of preventing or controlling. I was denounced by voices from the crowd as a companion thief with McDevitt; was told I would never come to Edgefield again; was charged with getting up the Hamburgh riot to kill white people, excite the North, and getting United States troops to carry the election, and with a variety of other crimes, of which these are but specimens.

"I was followed by General Butler, who occupied his time without interruption. His speech was exceedingly violent and bitterly personal toward me, on account, principally, of my report of the Hamburgh massacre. Judge Mackey followed General Butler, and he in turn was followed by General Gary. Nearly the whole of General Gary's speech was directed against me. In bitterness and violence of personal abuse, I have certainly never heard or known its parallel. Nothing short of a verbatim report could give an idea of its character. His attacks were not confined to my official character, but extended to my personal life and affairs, with frequent threats against me personally in various contingencies.

"Judge Mackey next occupied about fifteen or twenty minutes in replying to some of General Gary's personal charges against me, and he was followed by General Butler.

"What I have now described occupied the time from a little after eleven until half past three—a fact which will give an idea of the time consumed by the interruptions of which I have spoken. At half past three I left the grove, in order to reach the Columbia train, at Pine House, the same evening, amid a torrent of jeers and yells, which continued to reach my ears without cessation until I had passed beyond the limits of the town. The meeting, though called and arranged for in every particular by the republicans, was at no time and in no sense under our control, only two of the six republican speakers from abroad who were present were permitted to speak at all, and, under the pressure of the white men who crowded upon it, the entire platform was brought to the ground before I left the scene. At this meeting the republicans were told, in the most emphatic terms, that the democrats had made up their minds to carry Edgefield County, and that they would carry it; that their leaders would be held to account personally; that the white people must and should rule the country. The whole meeting may be justly described as a torrent of abuse of me personally, and an exhibition of force and threats designed to intimidate the colored voters and their leaders. After we had reached the train at the several railroad stations in Edgefield County a number of the ARMED AND MOUNTED MEN who had attended the meeting at the court-house entered the car in which we sat, and, with rude and threatening manners, addressed their jeers and insults to General SMALLS and myself, especially WARNING US NOT TO COME TO EDGEFIELD AGAIN.

"I will add that the foregoing account of the meeting at Edgefield has been made from written memoranda, made by me while on my way to Columbia, and after my arrival at home the same evening. Nothing has been overstated, though much that was disgraceful has necessarily been omitted in this description."

The following is from the testimony of Lieutenant John Anderson, of the Eighteenth United States Infantry:

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where you at any republican meeting during this year?
Answer. Yes sir; at Laurens.
Q. When?
A. I forget the exact date; it was some two or three weeks before the election.
Q. Was there any interference with the meeting, and, if so, by whom?
A. There was, in my opinion, decided interference. There was a republican meeting to be held at a certain time in Laurens. The republican meeting was appointed for one day and there was a democratic meeting for the day following; I think the republican meeting was first. The republicans assembled there to have the meeting, and about the time when that meeting was to come together the "Hampton cavalry" came in with red shirts on, and all of them, or most of them to my personal knowledge, armed with revolvers strapped outside their garments, so as to be plainly visible. I believe one republican did speak, and then there was a great disturbance raised, and some of the county officers had to take refuge with me in order to save their lives.
Q. How near the place of holding the meeting were you?
A. At that time I was probably within one hundred yards.
Q. Could you hear what was going on?
A. Yes, sir; hear it a mile and a half or more. I heard yells and threats to kill certain men there who belonged to the republican party, repeatedly.
Q. Was that while the republican speaking was going on?
A. No, sir; after the speaking was over.
Q. During the time the speaking was going on, what was done?
A. During the time the speaking was going on I was not present at the meeting, because I made it a point during the whole campaign to absent myself from all political meetings whatever. I heard a great deal of noise, but I was not present at the time the political meeting was going on, and my knowledge of that is only hearsay.
Q. State what you know, if anything, of any noise or disturbance while the republicans were assembled or while they were holding their meetings.
A. There was a great deal of noise while the republicans were speaking. After that I was in Newberry where the republicans attempted to have a meeting, and I certainly know, of my personal knowledge, that they were drowned out by the noise that was made, and were not able to speak. Furthermore, some of the people took me for one of the politicians, and made an assault on me.
Q. Who did that? White men?
A. White men with red shirts. I don't know how many there were. I could not count them. They said there were fifteen hundred or two thousand.
Q. How would your own estimate correspond with that?
A. I don't know that. They filled the whole street from the depot up to the public square. I was passing from Laurens to Charleston. I had nothing whatever to do with their political meeting. I had to wait about an hour and a half at Newberry for the train, and while waiting I went up street to the post-office, which is kept by a friend of mine, and took dinner with him. After dinner I started to walk down street with a friend to the depot. About that time the republican meeting had broken up, and there was quite a number of republican speakers going along there. I had nothing to do with them. I was walking with my friend, who had nothing whatever to do with politics, (and even to this day I don't know what his politics are,) but before I reached the depot I was surrounded by a large crowd of horsemen with red shirts, who demanded to know my politics. I told them, as I would tell almost anybody who would ask such an impertinent question, that it was none of their business, and I continued my way up to the depot. Before I got there, however, they tried to ride over me; backed up their horses and tried to make them kick me; and in fact they heaped many insults upon me. I got upon the platform, and turned around to know what they had to say, and a number approached me and demanded to know my politics. I declined to tell them what my politics were. They shook their fists violently in my face. Some of them had revolvers; and they called me a God damned radical, and quite a number of other names, and demanded to know who I was. While this was going on a gentlem whom I knew who was with that party, a democrat, rode up and begged them to stop. "That is Lieutenant Anderson, of the Army; I know him." It was some time before he could be heard, but as soon as he could be heard they stopped their demonstrations against me at once, and then they gave quite a number of cheers for "Lieutenant Anderson, a straight-out democrat." I had no further trouble from that party. The train soon left. I heard the speakers that were there insulted. I can give their names, if required. One of them was L. Cass Carpenter, of this city; another was a professor of the university; and another was Mr. Taft, of Charleston, a member of the Legislature; and, I think, there was another one, but I am not sure as to the fourth.

ALEXANDER S. RICHARDSON (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. At Chester Court-House, Chester County
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. Over five years.
Q. What business are you engaged in?
A. I am a school-teacher.
Q. Where were you on the day of the last presidential election?
A. I was at Chester Court-House.
Q. Did you vote there?
A. I did.
Q. Did you hold any office at the election?
A. I was the secretary of the county executive committee of the republican party, and I acted as chairman a good deal of the time.
Q. What do you know, if anything, of intimidation of republican voters in that county?
A. As secretary of the executive committee there, most of my knowledge came to me without coming under my personal observation.
Q. State what you know yourself.
A. I remember an instance in the early part of September. I went out to speak, in connection with three or four other persons, at Carmel Hill, fifteen miles west of Chester Court-House. It was a republican mass-meeting, but there were several democrats present and a number of democratic speakers went from Chester Court-House about the time of the organization of the meeting and asked for a joint discussion or a division of time, which was granted. Some of the speakers went on home after the speaking was over, and others went on horseback. I, in company with three others who had spoken at the Carmel Hill precinct, was escorted back to Chester Court-House by a body of three armed men, democrats, I should judge from their affiliations, who threatened our lives if we dared to speak again in the county of Chester. They were riding behind me on horseback, and I was in a wagon without a top. Three pistols were pointed at me, and four pistols were pointed within four or five inches of my head, because I turned around and referred to their impoliteness in abusing men on their way from a political meeting where a joint discussion was allowed. We were subjected to gross abuse. This instance came under my own personal observation.
Q. Do you know of any intimidation on the day of the election?
A. The chief marshal of the county, Mr. Alexander George, who was shot a few days after the election, acted with me in accumulating the reports from the various United States marshals that were stationed at the various precincts in that county.
Q. Did you attend any other republican meetings than the ones you have spoken of?
A. No, sir.
Q. Why not?
A. I was advised by my friends, in order to save my life, that I had better not speak any more in the county, and I concluded to do office-work.
Q. Were the republicans able to hold meetings in the county away from the county-seat?
A. They were able to hold joint meetings, but not republican meetings alone.
Q. How were they induced to hold joint meetings? Did the democrats demand of the republicans a division of time?
A. They always asked them to divide the time.

By Mr. ABBOTT:

Q. Are you speaking of your own knowledge or from what you heard?
A. I am speaking of my own knowledge, of one meeting that I have told you about.
Q. Was this meeting that you spoke of announced as a republican meeting alone?
A. Yes, sir; a republican mass-meeting.
Q. Did the democrats ever divide the time at their meetings?
A. No, sir; they were not requested to.
Q. Was there any republican meeting in the county, so far as you know, where the democrats did not make a demand for a division of time?
A. No, sir; no meeting in that county to my recollection.

WILLIAM M. HOLLAND (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. At Ninety-Six precinct, Abbeville County. I was clerk for the board of election at that precinct.
Q. Were you at any republican meetings this year?
A. Well, we had about three republican meetings—our secret caucus. We didn't have a chance to have any republican meetings, because when we had a meeting the democrats would come to our meeting anyhow. They even came into the church on Saturday and Sunday evenings, and they told us to our face that where we had a meeting they allowed to come to it.
Q. Why did you have secret meetings?
A. Just to talk over matters among ourselves.
Q. Was it in consequence of the fact that democrats would come to your meetings if they were public?
A. O, yes, sir; because when we met to elect our delegation to the county convention they often came there themselves.
Q. Were any of your republican meetings disturbed by the democrats?
A. No, sir; not disturbed. They didn't break up the meetings at all. They merely said they came there for peace, and they didn't do us any harm at all, but they would come to any meetings we had to see what we are doing. They said they intended to see what we were doing.
Q. Did you have any speeches at your meetings?
A. No, sir; we did not; because we were afraid to have any speaking.
Q. Why were you afraid?
A. We was afeard they would do something to us, because they came with pistols girded around them—the democrats.
Q. How many of them would come?
A. I could not tell you how many, because they would come in crowds.

II.—PROSCRIPTION AND VIOLENCE IN VARIOUS FORMS.

1. Land-owners notifying lessees to leave premises.

It is abundantly proved that the colored people were made to know to a very large extent that if they voted the republican ticket they would be driven from the lands of the democrats.

General M. C. Butler, whose relations to the "Hamburg massacre" have been the subject of much discussion, and who received the votes of the democrats in the general assembly for Senator in December last, testified before the committee as follows:

Question. Did you say to the other colored men that they could not remain on your land unless they voted the democratic ticket?

Answer. I don't know that I said that; I said this: I went down and gave them tickets, and said to them that they had a right to vote the republican ticket if they pleased; that they were free men, as free as I was, but if they exercised that right, and imposed taxes on me which were destroying my property and prospects, I should throw myself back on some of the rights I had under the laws of the country, and see that they left my plantation.

Q. How many men had you living on your lands?

A. I had a good many; twenty or thirty.

Q. They all voted the democratic ticket?

A. O, no, sir; six or seven of them voted the democratic ticket, some of them did not vote at all, and I do not know how the others voted, but I intend to inform myself.

Q. With a view to turning them off if they voted the republican ticket?

A. Not for voting the republican ticket if they had an honest ticket, but for voting for these thieves and robbers here. I have done so, and I intend to do it hereafter.

This system is disclosed by the following editorial article in the Marion Star of September 27:

"RENT NEITHER LANDS NOR HOUSES TO ANY ONE WHO VOTES THE RADICAL TICKET.

"The above heading forms a part of a resolution which is being adopted generally by all the land-owners throughout the country, and is looked upon by the colored people as a hardship—a kind of persecution. A hardship it may apparently seem to them, as the farmer thus assumes the independence of asserting what class of laborers he will and he will not employ. It has taken him eight years to arrive at this independence; but the continued depreciation of his lands, the financial stagnation of the country, the high taxes that threaten confiscation, all have conspired to make him declare that he will not longer harbor the agent of his misfortune. * * We laud the plan, and think every farmer in the country should give it his hearty support. Let every farmer accept it, and the colored voters had as well butt against a brick wall as oppose it.

"Farmers have tried moral suasion until the folly of that course has become self-evident, and now they come to the exercise of a legal right which can but produce the desired result. Adopt the plan and stick to it, and two years hence they will not need the support of such a resolution, for the colored voters will have felt the benign influence of good government, and will readily act with their employers. The manufacturers up north, who have their hundreds of employés, march up to the polls and vote their whole company as they see fit, and southern employers have the same right and should dare exercise it."

The following appeared in the Charleston News and Courier as part of the correspondence of the well-known "Paysan," writing from the Fork of Edisto, under date of September 18:

"The following resolutions, adopted by the Easterlin's Mill Democratic Club, are commended to the attention of the different clubs throughout the State. Similar resolutions have been adopted by the Willow Township, Graham's, and Bambergh clubs, and no doubt by many other clubs in Orangeburgh and Barnwell Counties. It is intended that the names of the obnoxious leaders in each township be sent to the different clubs throughout the county:

"1. Resolved, That we will not rent land to any radical leader, or any member of his family, or furnish a home, or give employment to any such leader, or any member of his family."[39]

2. Proscription by refusal to give republicans employment.[40]

The following resolutions, published in the Columbia Register of September 28, were "unanimously adopted" by the democratic club of ward 3 in the city of Columbia:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this club that the time has come when we must distinguish our friends from our foes; that we must manfully show our preference in the employment of and in the trading with those who support the grand movement of reform and honest government to those who are endeavoring to foist upon us the same corrupt and dishonest administration that for eight years has had no object but the degradation of the name of South Carolina and the personal aggrandizement of the carpet-baggers and a few renegades.

"Resolved, That rumors being current in the city that certain merchants in this ward are going to show their preference for the present administration on the 7th of November next, that the president of this club do appoint a committee of three or five, the duty of this committee being to present the roll to every man in the ward for signatures, thereby giving to each one the opportunity of vindicating himself, and at the same time enabling the honest laborers for reform to discriminate between friends and foes, and that they report at the earliest possible time.

"Resolved, That this resolution shall apply equally forcible to porters about stores and offices, carpenters, mechanics, barbers, butchers, hack-drivers, and, in fact, to every one who receives wages from the honest citizens of this ward."

In the Charleston News and Courier of August 7, in an account of the county democratic convention of Aiken County, it is stated that a resolution was adopted by the convention "recommending the people of the county to employ no one who refused to vote the ticket put forward by the State democratic convention."

3. Proscription of republicans by withholding patronage.

The leading democratic newspaper of the State—the Charleston News and Courier—of September 20, 1876, published the proceedings of a democratic meeting in Charleston, from which the following is an extract:

"The meeting of the sixth ward democratic club last night was attended by about two hundred voters, white and colored. Mr. R. C. Barkley, the chairman of the ward, presided. The meeting having been called to order, Mr. Isaac Hayne submitted the following:

* * * * * * *

"'Resolved, That no good citizen should, directly or indirectly, do anything which may tend to perpetuate the grievances of which we complain, by aiding or assisting those who are endeavoring to continue in power the men who are responsible for this deplorable condition of affairs, and every lawful means should be adopted to prevent so disastrous a result.

"'Resolved, That in our opinion the interest of the democratic party will be promoted if, in purchasing supplies, employing laborers, &c., those co-operating with that party will give the preference to persons who intend to join us in this struggle.'" (Evidence, p. 325.)

The following appeared in the Charleston News and Courier as part of the correspondence of the well-known "Paysan," writing from the Fork of Edisto, under date of September 18:

"The following resolutions, adopted by the Easterlin's Mill democratic club, are commended to the attention of the different clubs throughout the State. Similar resolutions have been adopted by the Willow Township, Graham's, and Bamberg clubs, and no doubt by many other clubs in Orangeburgh and Barnwell Counties. It is intended that the names of the obnoxious leaders in each township be sent to the different clubs throughout the county:

* * * * * * *

"'2. That we will not furnish any such [republican] leader, or any member of his family, any supplies, such as provisions, farm implements, stock, &c., except so far as contracts for the present year are concerned.

"'3. That we will not purchase anything any radical leader or any member of his family may offer for sale, or sell any such leader or any member of his family anything whatever.

"'4. That the names of such persons who may be considered leaders be furnished to this club at the earliest date, and that a list of the same be furnished each member of the club.

"'5. That whenever any person or persons who shall be denominated radical leaders by a vote of this club shall cease as such, these resolutions shall become null and void so far as such leader or leaders, or any member of his or their families, are concerned.'"

4. Social proscription of republicans.

The evidence of social proscription was abundant, but there was a manifest propriety in leaving that mainly untouched. The following are sufficient indications of the general sentiment of democratic citizens.

Colonel J. S. Cothran, of Abbeville, in the democratic convention in May last, as reported in the Charleston News and Courier of May 8, 1876, said:

"Many have joined that [the republican] party to their eternal disgrace, and they will never recover from it. No, sir; nor their children, nor their children's children. [Cheers.] The very fact of their deserting their friends and their race is the best proof of their dishonesty. Fidelity is the best proof of honesty of soul, and he who has it not to his State and to his people is altogether dishonest."

In a democratic speech made at Walhalla on the 4th of September, and reported in the Greenville Enterprise of September 16, Ex-Governor B. F. Perry used the following language.

"And here I would appeal to my democratic friends all over the State to stop all social intercourse with any man who is base enough to be a radical. Let him feel by your conduct toward him that the brand of infamy is on him and his children. This is the only way you can reach his black heart. Let him see that there is a moral pestilence around him which prevents all social contact with honorable men, and leaves him for patronage and society to his own chosen rogues and plunderers."

The Lancaster Ledger of August 30 gives a report of a democratic meeting at Lancaster Court House, at which the following resolution was "unanimously adopted:"

"Whereas several white citizens of Lancaster village and county have associated themselves with the negro radical party, and thereby turned against their own race, and rendered themselves unworthy of social recognition by the Anglo-Saxon race:

"Be it resolved, That we, the democratic citizens of Lancaster village, pledge ourselves not to countenance them except only in business transactions, and that we also request our young men and boys in the village and county to carry out this resolve."

This social proscription rests upon the assumption by democrats that republicans are destitute of respectability and are not entitled to social recognition. Thomas S. Grimke, a physician of Charleston, said in his evidence at Charleston on the 30th of December "there were NO respectable radicals [republicans] here." (See evidence, part 2, p. 233.) He reflected a sentiment quite common.

These are only examples selected from a vast mass of similar evidence, and they are submitted here as proof of the fact already alleged, that the democratic party adopted and carried out a systematic plan of social and political proscription, with the set and avowed purpose of forcing men to vote contrary to their convictions and wishes.

It is very certain that the written and formal statements of the plans of political coercion convey a very faint idea of the actual practice of the democratic party. Prudence and good policy in a majority of instances would naturally dictate the concealment of such plans, and the instances now cited of open avowals of the purpose of political coercion are for that reason the more startling proofs of the spirit in which the system had its origin. The advertising columns of the Charleston News and Courier, and the local columns of other democratic newspapers in this State furnish abundant examples that the published evidence which has been cited falls far short of representing the extent of the system which they disclose.

Of course, no law can cure evils of this character. But the fact of this social proscription is adduced as evidence to corroborate the existence of the greater outrages to which the sentiment that underlies it has led.

5. By displays of armed force and threats of personal violence by day and by night.

The evidence on this subject is abundant and convincing. This sufficiently appears from the evidence to which reference has been and will be made herein.

6. Intimidation by firing upon the houses of colored people at night.

Upon this subject the following extract from the evidence is given by way of example:

BEVERLY VANCE (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. State your age and residence.

Answer. I am forty-four, and live at Abbeville.

Q. Were you in Abbeville County at the last presidential election?

A. I was at Cokesberry.

* * * * * * *

Q. State if you heard such threats made at any time prior to the election.

A. For months there has been threats of that sort; many of them had been turned out; myself had been thrown out as being an adviser. They had been defeated two years ago in the Green and Chamberlain election. I myself was in favor of the Chamberlain ticket this last time, and a great many of them would not take the ticket or would come to me and ask what was my opinion about it. I told them it was the best thing for them to stick to their party, and the democrats had seen fit to set me and my family aside. I have a boy as big as myself. They undertook to push me out, and since the election they have met in the club and made allthat belong to that club pledge themselves——

Mr. ABBOTT. You don't know what was done in the club?

The WITNESS. I don't know anything more about it than this: Democrats themselves, members of the club, have come to me. I bought a piece of land of Dr. Noah, a member of the club, and he has seen fit to receive $80 from me since the election, and when I gave him my note to receipt me of the money he saw fit to keep the paper and the money, and he has told me to give up the house on the 1st day of January, and I have paid him altogether $387.

Q. Are the members of the Labor Reform Club democrats or republicans?

A. They are democrats.

Q. What have they said about employing you?

A. They have told me that I must not be employed by any of them any more; that if they saw no other way to get me away from there before the next election they would kill me.

Q. You have not received any employment from them since July?

A. No, sir.

Q. Had you received employment from them previously?

A. O, yes; I have been very popular with the gentlemen ever since 1868. They generally look to me as a man that advises the party sometimes. I do not go through the county stump-speaking, but a great many comes to me and puts confidence in me, and asks what I think best, and I tell them.

Q. How large a family have you?

A. My wife and eight children. From the threats made about me before the election, there was several republicans that came there to guard me, expecting me to be killed; and these people passed by my house cursing and abusing me, and on Thursday night after the election they came through by my house, going down to serenade Colonel Aiken, and they shot all through my yard, and shot bullets through my doors, and shot into my house, and the bullets are there now. They put four in the door; and another man that lives about two hundred and fifty yards from me got two balls in his door.

Q. How long have you lived in that neighborhood?

A. Twenty-nine years. I moved in there in 1847.

7. Individual murders of republicans.

On page 366 of the evidence, part 1, the following account is given by Governor Chamberlain, under date of October 4, 1876, of the murder of republicans:

"I give you an account of the murder of Simon P. Coker, a member of the present Legislature and a delegate to the recent republican convention in Columbia, as related to me by an intelligent and trustworthy eye-witness of the scene, a person well known to me personally. While sitting in the car of the railroad train at Ellenton, on the 19th ultimo, my informant saw Coker walking unarmed in company with several armed white men. Coker's manner indicated that he did not consider himself a prisoner or in any danger, as he was talking freely with the white men who accompanied him. Coker and those who accompanied him proceeded to a piazza in front of a store at Ellenton Station and sat down for a few moments, but soon proceeded to a large tree standing about thirty rods from the spot where my informant stood, Coker still appearing unconcerned. While standing under this tree the white men suddenly stepped away from Coker about six paces, and, turning, fired a volley into his body. He instantly fell, whereupon several of the party advanced toward his body and fired upon it a second time. My informant also mentions as a fact that he saw N. A. Patterson, a democratic trial-justice of Barnwell County, walking in company with Coker at Ellenton Station at the time first above stated. Coker, it now appears, had been enticed from his home to Ellenton upon some false pretense of a summons to answer a criminal charge.

"The killing of colored people in connection with the Ellenton riot extended far and wide, and was kept up for several days. In truth, my information leads me to believe that it cannot be said to have ceased now. Persons living in the vicinities named vouched to me personally for the truth of these, among many other, instances of murders of colored men in Barnwell County, growing out of the Ellenton riot.

"On the 24th of September several colored men were picking cotton near Elko, among whom were two refugees from the vicinity of Ellenton. Eight or ten white men rode into the field and fired upon these refugees, killing one and wounding the other. The dead body was carried and thrown into a swamp, where it was found on the 25th by Trial Justice Black, of Blackville, and Captain Kenzie, of the United States garrison at Blackville.

"On the night of the 24th a party of white men visited the house of a colored man, about seven miles from Blackville, and took out a colored man who was a refugee from near Ellenton. This refugee has not been seen or heard of since.

"On Sunday, September 24, two colored men, escaping from the vicinity of Ellenton, passed a church near Allendale while the white people were at church. They were pursued by white men from the church, and overtaken at the cabin of a colored man at early evening. One was shot and died of his wounds at nine o'clock that night, and the other, though wounded, escaped.

"These are but a few of the outrages which I fully believe have been committed by white democrats, members of democratic rifle-clubs, upon colored republicans in Barnwell County alone. More than forty colored and white refugees are reported to me as under protection of the United States troops in their camp at Blackville at this time.

"I present these facts to you as a portion of the evidence now in my hands and within my knowledge, which refutes your claim that the methods and agencies now employed by the democratic party are peaceful, orderly, and within the law.

"The present armed organizations, which constitute the effective force of the democratic party, as well as its chief agency in its canvass, are manifestly a menace to the peace of the State and the rights of the members of the republican party, because those organizations are unlawful in their origin, unlawful in their aims, and aggressive and law-breaking in their conduct."

The following is another specimen from the evidence, which shows also the difficulties in the way of ascertaining facts:

JOHN ANDERSON sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. What is your position in the Army?

Answer. I am a lieutenant in the Eighteenth Infantry.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any violence being inflicted upon colored men?

A. I have.

Q. State what it is.

A. The command to which I belonged was ordered from Greenville to Laurens the last of August of the present year. We started from Greenville on the 2d of September. Prior to that quite a number of colored men had come in to Greenville, and asked protection from the troops, and we gave them protection, and paid their expenses out of our private pockets.

Q. Did you give them protection in consequence of what they reported to you?

A. Yes, sir. We started out on the 2d of September to go to Laurens, thirty-six miles. We marched all night. About seven or eight o'clock in the morning our command arrived within ten miles of Laurens, and a white man came out and wanted to know if there was a surgeon in the command. We had a surgeon there, and the command was halted. I saw a negro who was shot; I did not examine the wound myself; he was lying in bed; I saw him but did not see the wound. He died within twelve hours after I was there.

Q. Was it a matter of common notoriety that he died next day?

A. It was.

Q. How many hours was it before his reported death that you saw him?

A. About twelve, as near as I can remember.

Q. State whether you were requested to write down his dying statement or declaration.

A. I was.

Q. State what he said as to the cause of his death.

Mr. ABBOTT. I object. A dying statement is not evidence, except in case of the trial of a man for murder.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I propose to show by this witness that this colored man, while in a dying condition, said that he had been shot by a democrat without any provocation, when he was endeavoring to escape from an assault made upon him by a democrat, and because he was a republican; that he was assaulted in the road by a democrat who met him and fired upon; that he attempted to flee, and while fleeing was shot by this democrat.

The committee sustained the objection.

The following is from the testimony of Hon. David T. Corbin, who was sworn and examined:

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 26, 1876.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Charleston, South Carolina.

Q. What office do you hold?

A. United States district attorney for this district.

Q. How long have you been district attorney?

A. Since April, 1867.

Q. What steps did you take to ascertain whether there had been any violation of the laws of the United States at the last election in Aiken County, in this State?

A. About the middle of September I went to Aiken County, taking a United States commissioner with me, to investige the troubles that had been reported to me in a general way. Upon a very casual examination, I found that a large number of murders had been committed.

Mr. ABBOTT. I object. Anything that the witness knows of his own personal knowledge, of course he may state.

The WITNESS. It was alleged that large numbers of murders of colored people had been committed on account of their political sentiments, and on account of their race and color. I proceeded to investigate those charges, and called before me and before the commissioner some two or three hundred witnesses, and took their testimony in writing, at great length. I had a stenographer with me to assist in the investigation. The witnesses were all sworn. Upon the affidavits thus made before me, I caused about five hundred warrants to be issued for the arrest of parties charged with those crimes in Aiken County.

Q. Crimes committed during this current year.

A. Yes, sir; during August, September, and October.

Q. What amount of testimony did you take in the form of affidavits?

A. I took about one thousand pages of legal-cap paper, and examined about two hundred or two hundred and twenty witnesses.

Q. You have that testimony now?

A. I have, at my office.

Q. You are ready to produce it to the committee if they desire?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was done in the court upon the warrants which you issued?

A. The prisoners were arrested by the deputy marshal, aided by the United States troops, and brought to Aiken, and they appeared there with a large array of counsel and waived examination, and gave bonds for their appearance before the United States court, the counsel stating that they did not propose to go into an examination, and so give me an opportunity to produce before the country the testimony of the witnesses as to these outrages.

Q. What was done in the court?

A. The defendants, all that were arrested, were bound over to appear before the United States court. I think some one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety were arrested, and they appeared before the United States court at the term just adjourned. Informations were prepared against all of them, but not nled. A controversy arose in court as to whether informations would lie instead of indictments, and the court held that I should have proceeded by indictment, especially upon one section of the act which I had relied upon—section 5508 of the Revised Statutes—and they quashed the informations. No further proceedings were taken in court at that term, because we had discharged the grand jury, not apprehending that they would be required, and we could not then proceed further. The cases have been continued until the next term.

Q. Have you prepared a tabulated statement of the names of persons charged with crimes in that county, with the names of the witnesses in part on whose affidavits they were arrested, and the number of persons who were alleged to have been killed or injured in that county during the year?

A. I have.

Q. Can you produce it?

A. This is the statement, [producing a paper.] [This is annexed to these Views as Appendix E.]

Q. This signature is yours?

A. Yes, sir; I have certified to that as from the records of my office.

Mr. LAWRENCE offered the statement in evidence.

Mr. ABBOTT objected to its reception.

Q. What number of persons are alleged to have been killed in that county during this year?

A. Twenty-three or twenty-four, I think, in that county during this season.

Q. All colored men?

A. All colored.

Q. State whether any investigations were made in regard to other counties?

A. Very slight investigations were made in Edgefield and Laurens and Barnwell Counties by the United States commissioners, but they were not lawyers, nor did they have the advice of lawyers, and they made very little progress.

Q. Have the investigations been completed in the counties which you have just named?

A. No, sir; they are right in their incipiency.

Q. So far as those investigations have gone, can you state the number of alleged violations of the laws of the United State by acts against colored men in any one of those counties?

A. No, sir; I don't think I have sufficient evidence to indicate, except in a very general way, the number of violations of law. From information which has come to me in my official capacity, I have reason to believe that they are very numerous.

Q. What is the character of the crimes alleged before you upon sworn testimony which you have now in your possession?

A. Eight or ten murders of colored men in Laurens, and in Barnwell County some ten or fifteen murders of colored men; but, as I said before, I have had no opportunity to personally investigate them. I have the names of the colored men alleged to have been killed, and the witnesses who have made the affidavits, and I can furnish those to the committee.

Q. You have the sworn testimony of the witnesses?

A. Simply affidavits furnished me by the commissioner.

Q. What other crimes have you sworn testimony of having been committed against colored persons during this year?

A. Whipping on account of their political sentiments or because they were going to vote the republican ticket, and quite a large number of them have been wounded, have been shot at, and have escaped with slight wounds. The crimes range from murder down to flogging and intimidation in lesser degrees; threats to turn them off the land; threats to turn them into the road; threats to kill them, &c.

The statement furnished by the United States district attorney shows "four hundred and seventy-two persons charged by affidavit with conspiracy to injure and intimidate persons of African descent in Aiken County, lawfully entitled to vote, in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude, contrary to section 5508 Revised Statutes of the United States; and, second, to injure said persons on account of their support or advocacy of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States; and to injure said persons on account of giving their support or advocacy of the election of a member of the Congress of the United States, contrary to section 5520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

The statement shows twenty-two colored persons killed and from ten to fifteen wounded in that county. These grew out of what were called the riots in Aiken County, but what were in fact deliberately planned schemes of murder of colored citizens because of their political opinions.

IRA W. RICE sworn and examined.

These were intended for political effect.

A writer of much candor, referring to the democratic policy and the condition of affairs as early as June, says:

"Mr. Tilden had just been nominated at Saint Louis, and the brilliant prospects of electing him were triumphantly paraded. Then came race conflicts, the killing of a colored legislator in Darlington County, the lynching of two negroes in Marlborough and six in Edgefield, and finally the Hamburgh massacre, in Aiken County, July 8."[41]

8. Massacre of republicans—riot and bloodshed.

The State of South Carolina during the past year has presented scenes of bloodshed and massacre rarely ever equaled in time of peace in any community professing to be civilized. The committee in their report practically concede this. They say:

"Much evidence was taken before the three subcommittees upon the subject of intimidation and violence previous to and during the election. Evidence was also introduced to prove that there had been many homicides and other wrongs committed upon colored people by the whites which had never been punished by process of law. The condition of affairs in the State for the last ten years has been such that much turbulence and disorder would be natural and to be expected."

It is abundantly proved by the testimony of General Conner and other leading democrats that the colored people are "quiet and inoffensive." It is a historical fact well attested that, even during the rebellion, they were orderly and peaceable.

The colored people constitute the great body of the republican party. When the committee, therefore, say that "much turbulence and disorder would be natural and to be expected," it is understood that this is their estimate of the character and purpose of a considerable portion of the white people who control the democratic party, and in this the majority of the committee candidly state the facts as shown by the evidence. They doubtless regard such turbulence "natural and to be expected," in view of the fact that South Carolina led in organizing the rebellion and that many of the leading democrats unwillingly submit to the results of the war, to the enfranchisement of the colored people and to their participation in political affairs.

THE HAMBURGH SLAUGHTER.

It appears that the purpose was formed on the part of the democracy of South Carolina, notably in Aiken, Edgefield, and Barnwell Counties first, in the early summer of 1876, to use intimidation, force, and violence as means of carrying the election. In May and June threats were freely made by the democrats in these counties, and circulated among the republicans, to the effect that all those who voted the republican ticket would be driven off the lands of the democrats and be refused employment, and that all leading republicans would be killed.[42] These threats were at first rather quietly and covertly made, but as time passed on they were more openly and boldly uttered, care being taken to express them to those who would circulate them, and that they should reach those most desired to be affected. These threats, at first, had little or no effect to frighten or to change the political sentiments of the colored republicans of those counties, and it therefore became necessary for the democracy to enter actively upon the programme of violence. This was inaugurated at Hamburgh, a small town in Aiken County, on the bank of the Savannah River, opposite the city of Augusta, Georgia, on the 8th of July, 1876.

There was a colored militia company in that town, organized under the laws of the State,[43] containing about eighty-four members, armed with guns furnished by the State, among the officers and men of which were intelligent and leading colored men. The destruction of this company was manifestly of the first importance, as its existence gave a sense of security to the colored republicans of that vicinity and counteracted the effect of the democratic threats of violence. This company paraded on the 4th day of July, 1876, under the command of its officers, and went through various military maneuvers in the streets of Hamburgh. Among the observers of this parade were two white democrats (as yet unknown to fame, but forever after to be) by the names of Henry Getsen and Thomas Butler.

They for a while sat in their buggy on one side of the street, observed the maneuvers of the company, and then, when the company was marching in open order down the street, and near the center of it, started their horse up the street with the view to drive through the midst of the company.[44] Captain D. L. Adams, (colored,) commanding the company, halted his men and expostulated with Getsen and Butler against their attempt to drive through the ranks of his company.[45] They, Getsen and Butler, persisted in their purpose, although there was sufficient room to pass on one side, and Captain Adams, to prevent trouble, opened a passage through the company for them, and they passed through.[46] The detention was but for a few moments, and was not, save perhaps in the matter of feeling, of the slightest consequence to Getsen and Butler or to the militia company. But, as the destruction of the militia company was desired by democrats, it was determined to take advantage of the occurrence for that purpose. Accordingly, two or three days afterward a verbal complaint was made, not by said Getsen or Butler, but by R. J. Butler, father of Thomas Butler and father-in-law of Getsen, to Prince Rivers, (colored,) trial justice at Hamburgh, against the officers of the militia company for obstructing the street on the above occasion. The trial justice issued a summons, not a warrant, calling the officers before him to answer the charge.[47] On the day of the proposed trial and final hearing, (the case having been on a former day partially inquired into and postponed,) appeared in Hamburgh, General M. C. Butler, of Edgefield County.[48] At or about the same time there came into the village about one hundred white men, thoroughly armed with guns and pistols.[49] This body of white men immediately gathered about General M. C. Butler, and submitted to his direction and control.[50] General Butler first assumed to appear as the attorney of R. J. Butler, to prosecute the inquiry before Trial Justice Rivers against the officers of the militia company.[51] But the officers of the militia company, hearing of the threats against their lives, made by the white armed men surrounding General Butler, refused to appear before Trial Justice Rivers for the purpose of further examination.[52] At this stage of the proceedings, the farce begun before the trial justice was abandoned,[53] and General M. C. Butler sent a demand to Captain D. L. Adams to surrender to him the arms of his company. This demand was refused by Captain Adams, as General M C. Butler had not in law a shadow of right to make the demand, and not a shadow of right to receive the guns if they had been surrendered. Finally General Butler notified Captain Adams "that he was going to have the arms in fifteen minutes." Captain Adams replied, "Then he (Butler) would have to take them by force." Thereupon General M. C. Butler commenced posting his men, now increased to several hundred, so as to command the brick building used as a drill-room and an armory by Captain Adams's company. Captain Adams and twenty-five members of his company had retired to this building.[54] After General Butler had stationed his men he again sent word to Captain Adams that the time was up, and inquired if he was going to give the guns up; to which Captain Adams replied that he could not give them up; that he did not desire any fuss, and that he and his men had gone out of the streets and into their hall for safety, and there they could remain.[55] After this answer had been returned to General Butler, and sufficient time for its reception by him had transpired, his men, who were stationed behind the abutment of the South Carolina Railroad bridge near by, opened, fire on the building occupied by Captain Adams and his company.[56] They fired rapidly for about half an hour, and broke out nearly all the glass in the four windows in the front of the building.

In the mean time Captain Adams's men, kept under cover, were not injured, and did not return the fire.[57] About this time General Butler's men began apparently to close in about the brick armory, and Captain Adams gave orders to his men to fire on them.[58] The firing on the part of Captain Adams was kept up irregularly for a short time, and till about dark. About midnight Captain Adams quietly withdrew his men from the brick building, with the intention of getting out of town and escaping.[59] He succeded in getting his men out of the building, and a part of them out of town, but part of them scattered off and hid themselves in various places in and about their houses. The escape from the brick building of Captain Adams's men was soon discovered by General Butler, and then a vigorous search was made for them, and for colored men generally.[60] Some one or two were killed as they were found,[61] but most that were captured were brought in and put under a strong guard.[62] About two o'clock in the morning some twenty-five or thirty colored men, some of whom were members of the militia company and some not, had been found and brought in, and so placed under guard. The search being over, now came the slaughter.[63] One by one they were taken out and deliberately shot to death. First, A. T. Attaway, lieutenant in Captain Adams's company, was so taken out and murdered. Then Dave Phillips was taken out and murdered. Next followed Pompey Curry, who, on being let loose, precipitately fled, was fired upon and badly wounded, but escaped with his life. Next Hamp Stevens was taken out and murdered; and, following him, Alfred Minyard, or Minyon, was killed. No more were killed out of these prisoners, though some were badly wounded. During the night two others were killed, namely, James Cook, town marshal, and Moses Parkes.[64]

These brutal and causeless murders were clearly committed, as the testimony shows, to effect political ends, and as a part of the plan of the political campaign adopted by the democrats.[65] The relation which General M. C. Butler, one of the most distinguished political leaders of the democratic party, sustained to these was made the subject of much evidence, and a reference to that is all that is deemed necessary now.[66] Comment is unnecessary.

It denounces boldly the outrages by the democrats.

This document fully confirms this account of the Hamburgh massacre. Governor Chamberlain in his letter of September 28, 1876, to Colonel Haskell, published in the evidence, shows these "undisputed facts of the massacre. Those who committed the massacre were white democrats; those who were massacred were colored republicans. It is a fact as well authenticated as the assassination of President Lincoln that five unarmed republicans while held as captives by a large body of armed white democrats were deliberately and wantonly shot to death by their white democratic captors, and when all resistance or show of resistance to the white democrats had ceased."

being about twenty-five miles from Hamburgh, and about twenty-four miles from Aiken Court House, and near the Savannah River. It is a fertile region and quite densely populated, the colored population being largely in the majority.

During the spring and summer of 1876 nearly all the white democrats in the county were thoroughly armed and organized into bodies known commonly as "rifle clubs." There were in this portion of the county a considerable number of quite intelligent colored republicans, and several republican clubs formed. The policy of intimidation, force, and violence to control the political action of republicans was announced by the white democrats[67] in all this section in June, July, and August, and in substantially the same manner as was done prior to the Hamburgh massacre. About the middle of September the "rifle clubs" from different portions of the county of Aiken, and also from the adjoining counties of Edgefield and Barnwell, suddenly and evidently by concerted action, began to march toward and assemble at Silverton.

The number of white democrats armed and mounted thus assembled during September 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 was probably about eight or nine hundred.[68] Colonel A. P. Butler, of Hamburgh, South Carolina, appears to have been in general command.[69] Under him, and commanding "rifle clubs" and irregular bodies, were Angus P. Brown, George W. Croft, Wallace Miller, Augustus White, Frank Green, O. N. Butler, of Augusta, Georgia, Alonzo Ashley, Warren Keenan, and many others.

The absurd pretext for this assemblage of armed men, as put forth by parties interested, was the reported assault on Mrs. Harley by one or two colored men, who are said to have entered the house of Alonzo Harley for the purpose of stealing.[70] It was charged by Mrs. Harley that she was knocked down by one of these men, who fled on her rising and seizing a gun. The two colored men charged with this assault and attempt to steal were not recognized by Mrs. Harley or any one else at the time, although it occurred in broad daylight, in the forenoon of Friday, September 15, 1876. Suspicion fell upon a young colored man by the name of Peter Williams and another man named Frederick Pope. Three white men immediately started in search of Williams, found him in the House of Addison Hollywonger, (colored,)[71] where he had been confined by sickness for several days with chills and fever,[72] and, although so informed, they arrested him without warrant, and started for Alonzo Harley's house. On the way, and near there, they were met by Alonzo Harley, who commenced to curse and beat Williams,[73] who, finding himself free and unprotected by his captors, started to run. Thereupon he was fired upon and badly wounded, from which wound he subsequently died.[74] While yet alive he was taken in a cart to Harley's house, to ascertain whether Mrs. Harley identified him as the man who had assaulted her. She, on seeing him, at once said he was not the man.[75] The shooting of Peter Williams occurred about noon or a little before,[76] on Friday, September 15, 1876. On the evening of the same day a warrant was sworn out "on information and belief" by one Taville, before Trial Justice Griffin, for the arrest of the said Peter Williams and Pope for the said assault on Mr. Harley.[77]

The "rifle clubs" assembled in considerable force that afternoon at Matlock Church, near said Alonzo Harley's house, and were largely increased in numbers during the following day. Toward evening of Saturday, three of the companies of "rifle clubs," thoroughly armed and mounted, moved down to Chevis's store, some three-fourths of a mile distant, where a republican colored club had, as usual on that day of the week, assembled, and for the purpose of breaking it up.[78] The members of this club, hearing of the purpose of the rifle-clubs to attack and break them up, hastily adjourned before their arrival, though a few of them were still at Chevis's store when the rifle clubs arrived. Those that still remained there were, with curses, notified to meet no more by Captain Angus Brown,[79] who commanded the rifle club in the advance. There was much cursing, and many threats of violence were made on the part of members of the "rifle clubs" toward the republicans in case they should meet again, and it was promised on the part of the members present that they would not meet again. Some effort was made by members of the rifle club to then and there attack the few colored men found, but it was finally said by the whites, "There were not enough of them for a riot."[80] These three companies passed down the road by the store, and during the evening returned and went into camp at Matlock Church.

On the following (Sunday) morning the rifle clubs, under the command of A. P. Butler, [80a] marched to Rouse's Bridge, a point some four miles distant from Matlock Church. Here they found a considerable number of colored people assembled, some to attend church, and others for mutual consultation on account of the rumored purpose of the "rifle clubs" to attack them.[81] The "rifle clubs" halted on the high ground, about half a mile from the bridge, and sent messengers to the colored people at the bridge, under the pretense of desiring a "compromise" with them.[82] While the parley was being held several members of the rifle clubs fired upon colored men who happened near them, mortally wounding one, Henry Campbell, and severely wounding several others.[83]

The colored men thus shot were all republicans. After much delay there, and upon the repeated assurance of the colored people that they desired no disturbance, and that they were seeking only safety in the swamp near the bridge, the "rifle clubs," toward evening, fell back and marched toward Union Bridge, a point some six miles distant.[84] Here a detachment of some twenty or twenty-five men, under the command of Captain Robert Dunbar, fired upon a small party of men, killing one, Basil Bryant, alias Basil Bush, and wounding several others.[85] On the following morning one of those wounded, Wilkins Hamilton, was found in his cabin and deliberately shot to death by some of the members of the rifle clubs.[86] Early on Monday morning, and during the day, the "rifle clubs" were moving in various directions, murdering colored republicans. Kit Finnissee was shot in the morning and killed by a company or detachment under Captain Angero P. Brown, near —— Station, on the Port Royal Railroad. Colonel A. P. Butler was at the time present with this detachment, and ordered him shot.[87] The colored men were there fired upon, but escaped.

Another detachment came upon five colored men in the cabin of Juda Kelsey, who had come in out of the swamp for their dinners, and murdered three of them, and tried to kill all of them, but the other two escaped by running. Here were killed David Bush, Sam Brown, and Warren Kelsey.[88] Another detachment, numbering several hundred, with which at the time, near evening, was Colonel A. P. Butler, near Ellenton Station, on the Port Royal Railroad, shot and killed John Kelsey.[89] Many other colored men were here seen and fired upon, but escaped with their lives, also several colored men were taken prisoners and threatened with death, but were not murdered on their promising not to vote the republican ticket. During Monday night, September 18, Colonel A. P. Butler, with a large portion of his command, about five hundred men, suddenly turned back from Ellenton Station upon Rouse's Bridge, some seven miles distant, and was there ready to attack the republicans on the morning of Tuesday, September 19, 1876.[90] In consequence of the movement of the rifle clubs, about seventy-five or one hundred colored republicans had been driven into this part of the swamp, where they were practically surrounded.[91]

In the councils of the rifle clubs it had been determined that all these colored men in the swamp should be killed. For this purpose Colonel Butler's forces were put in line of battle, with a skirmish-line thrown out, and the order to advance into the swamp had been given, and his command was in motion, and firing by the skirmishers on the republicans had commenced,[92] when a detachment of United States troops, under command of Captain Lloyd and Lieutenant Hinton, arrived on the scene from Aiken Court House and prevented the massacre. These colored men in the swamp and thus surrounded were nearly all without any weapons of defense at all,[93] though a few, fifteen or twenty, had shot-guns,[94] but were without ammunition, and hence were wholly at the mercy of the rifle clubs. The members of the rifle clubs openly declared in the presence of the United States troops that it was their intention to have killed the last one of them, and they expressed the greatest disgust at the interference of the United States troops.[95] There is no doubt that a fearful slaughter would have taken place but for the timely interference of the troops. Upon a parley held between Captain Lloyd and Colonel A. P. Butler and his officers it was agreed that the rifle clubs should disperse and return quietly to their homes, and that the colored men would go peaceably to theirs.[96] This arrangement was most thankfully received by the colored people, who were wild with joy at their unexpected deliverance.[97]

Pursuant to the arrangement made by Captain Lloyd, the rifle clubs began to disperse, but continued their murderous work upon the colored men on their way home. One party, after it left Rouse's Bridge, shot and killed Abram Hammond, alias Abram Blake, an old colored man past eighty years of age, who was quietly and innocently standing near the road when they passed.[98] His body was riddled with bullets. Another party, consisting of two or three hundred, at Ellenton Station, having captured Simon Coker, a leading republican and member of the State Legislature, deliberately took him out and shot him to death. Captain O. N. Butler, (so called,) of Augusta, Georgia, commanded the firing party, and he himself shot him with his revolver.[99] Subsequently, on the same day the rifle clubs, about two miles below Ellenton Station, captured two other colored republicans, William Gooden and George Turner, and deliberately shot them to death.[100] In the day following (Wednesday) Alonzo Ashley's company, under his command, in the edge of Barnwell County captured a leading colored republican named Edward W. Bush, finding him in his own house, and took him out a few rods from his door, and there, in full view of his family and friends, shot him to death.[101]

Many other colored republicans were killed in Barnwell, Edgefield,[102] and Laurens[103] Counties about this time by the rifle clubs, or members of those organizations, and under similar circumstances to those above narrated. The whole number killed in Aiken and Barnwell Counties alone, at this time, is estimated at between thirty and forty, and about the same number were wounded. There is no evidence that a single white man was injured by a colored man throughout the whole affair.[104] Two white men were killed; one in a quarrel with his fellow, the other shot and killed in the dark near his own home by an unknown person.[105] The bare statement of the foregoing facts is sufficient. They shock every sentiment of humanity and justice, and call for the interposition of the strong arm of the Government to protect the rights and lives of our recently enfranchised fellow-citizens.

CHARLESTON RIOT.

A riot occurred in the city of Charleston on the night of Wednesday, September 6, in which one white man was killed, and a large number of persons, both white and colored, wounded. This outbreak does not appear to have been premeditated, but it was the consequence of the highly excited condition of the people of both political parties, and the full responsibility for it must be charged upon the democratic leaders. It was but the natural and inevitable consequence of the plan of campaign projected by those leaders, willingly adopted by one part of their followers, and forced upon others of more moderate views by a rigorous social intolerance, that visited upon any of the white people of the city and State who failed heartily to support that policy all the terrors of business and social ostracism.

The testimony fully shows the causes which had been at work from the time when the speeches of General Ferguson and others, made at the Tilden and Hampton ratification meeting on the 25th of August, warned the republicans that what was known as the "Mississippi policy" was to be adopted in South Carolina; causes which are ample to produce even a far more disastrous result, a much greater destruction of life and property. The testimony of the mayor clearly sets forth the excited condition of the city; the population almost equally divided between the two political parties; the democratic rifle clubs arming, drilling, patrolling the streets; the democratic press teeming with inflammatory and threatening publications; the colored people excited and terrified by these preparations, the familiar symptoms of a war upon their political rights, which might well be as successful in South Carolina as it had been in the State from which its apostle had come to preach the crusade in Charleston.

Under these circumstances, an occasion could not be wanting, and, accordingly, on the night of September 6, at the closing of twelve or more political ward meetings, about equally divided between the two parties, those who had attended them met in crowds in the streets, with the result shown in the testimony. The material was evidently at hand to produce much more serious consequences than the killing of one man, a democrat, shot by one of his own party, and the wounding seriously of a policeman by a pistol-shot from a democrat, and the infliction of other slight wounds upon many others of both parties.

RIOT AT CAINHOY ON THE 16TH OF OCTOBER, 1876.

The loss of life on this occasion was much greater than at the riot in the city, six white men and one colored man having been killed. As in the riot of the 6th of September, there is conflict of testimony as to the party from which the first shot came, but the underlying causes of the outbreak of violence were the same. The division of time, which at other republican meetings had been enforced by the whites, was here agreed upon between the leaders; but the apprehensions which the general method of the democratic campaign had excited in the colored people led to their bringing arms with them, which, however, were not openly displayed at the meeting, but were left either in the bushes hard by or in an old house or carriage-shed near the stand occupied by the speakers. Whoever fired the first shot, the immediate cause of the riot which followed was undoubtedly the seizure, by some rough white men who accompanied the party of speakers from the city of Charleston, of the arms deposited by the colored men in this building. The whites having taken possession of these muskets, suddenly appeared with them in a hostile attitude within fifty feet or less of the speakers' stand. The bloody consequence of this proceeding followed, as a matter of course. A single shot from either side, whether effective or not, was followed by the drawing off of the two parties into opposed and hostile bands, and by indiscriminate firing. The whites being armed only with pistols, the advantage fell to the blacks, and the loss of life fell upon the whites, as before stated, in the proportion of six to one.

As in the case of the Charleston riots, these bloody consequences are chargeable directly to the hostile, uncompromising, violent methods, deliberately adopted by the democratic leaders. Meetings called for the orderly discussion of political topics were converted into scenes of conflict, because the one party had publicly avowed the purpose of invading by force the rights of the other. Arms taken up for these unlawful purposes were opposed by arms taken up for self-defense; and if all these occasions did not present similar scenes it was rather owing to some good fortune than to the tolerance of the one party or the patience of the other.

THE STATE AUTHORITIES UNABLE TO PRESERVE THE PEACE AND PROTECT LIFE.

General James Conner, an eminent lawyer of Charleston, and democratic candidate for attorney-general, testified before the committee as follows:

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. You say that [Governor] Chamberlain's government was powerless to protect the colored people?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. That is a fact, is it not?

A. I think so.

Q. Have the civil authorities in this State been able to protect the colored people for the last six or eight years?

A. I do not think they have.

Q. Not since the war, have they?

A. I do not think they have.

Q. Is it not a notorious fact that a large number of the men who have killed colored men have escaped punishment?

A. I think the fact is so.

Q. And it has been so ever since the war?

A. I think so.

Q. And have there not been a large number of colored men killed through the State, by common notoriety?

A. A good number.

Q. And has any white man been punished for killing any one of them?

A. I think not.

Q. Is it not a fact which you know from the condition of affairs in this State that there is a purpose on the part of the people to yield obedience to whatever is required through the United States troops?

A. O, unquestionably.

Q. Well, is it not equally true that there is a disposition to disregard whatever may be required by the civil authorities under Chamberlain?

A. There is, unquestionably.

The necessity for troops is shown by the governor's proclamation and other evidence already referred to.

It was under circumstances already stated, and in view of these facts, that Governor Chamberlain called upon President Grant for military aid, and that troops to the limited extent stated were located in the State.

TROOPS DID NOT INTERFERE WITH POLITICAL ACTION.

It is abundantly shown by the evidence that no officer or soldier ever attempted in the least to interfere with the free exercise of suffrage, or of any other right of any citizen, or to influence their political action or opinions. General Conner, the democratic candidate for attorney-general, testified as follows:

Q. Did you ever know or hear of any United States officer or soldier indicating in any way to the colored people that it was their duty to vote the republican ticket?

A. I never did.

Q. There was no such interference by troops?

A. O, no; the troops never countenanced that idea.

Merrimon Washington, a colored democrat, called as a witness by the majority of the committee, testified as follows:

Question. The colored people all understood that the troops were not here to interfere with their voting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they understood that the troops were here to protect them, so that they might vote as they chose?

A. Yes, sir; we all had the understanding of that.

Q. They were not afraid of the troops?

A. No, sir. (Evidence, part 1, page 405.)

The following extract from an account of a democratic meeting at Marion Court-House September 7, published in the Charleston News and Courier, (democratic,) shows that there is no pretense that the colored people were in any way interfered with on attending democratic meetings:

"MARION COURT-HOUSE, Saturday, September 30.

"General Hampton's triumphant march for the last week has been through that region of country denominated by John C. Calhoun as the garden-spot of South Carolina. The Pedee region is indeed one of the finest farming districts in the eastern portion of the State. After the great meeting at Bennettsville, the general and staff set out on an overland march to Marion, and on Friday their course was one of triumph and ovation.

* * * * * * *

"At an early hour this morning the town was alive with the cavalry, who kept coming in from every quarter. Carmichael's, Hillsborough, Reeves, Manning, Hardeeville, Bethea, Kirby, Moody, Marion, Wahee LeGettee, Rowell, Britton's Neck, Woodbury, Jeffries, Cain's, McMillan's, and Pedee Townships were all represented by their mounted clubs. E. M. Stoeber, the radical county chairman, in order to keep the colored people from attending the meeting, called all the township meetings for to-day. But the little game was evidently a failure, for hundreds of colored people were not only in town, but flocked to the meeting and remained throughout its entire progress, patient and interested spectators."

The President, in his message of January 22, 1877, said:

"The troops of the United States have been but sparingly used, and in no case so as to interfere with the free exercise of the right to vote."

An American soldier can never be better employed than in protecting American citizens in the enjoyment of their civil and political rights.

It is conclusively proved that there was a necessity for the troops to act as a posse comitatus to support the United States marshal and his deputies as civil officers in the discharge of duties enjoined by law, to enable citizens peaceably to vote.

It is conclusively proved that the troops were necessary "to keep the peace at the polls" as the law authorizes and requires. It is conclusively proved that they were necessary to protect the State "against domestic violence," a duty enjoined by the Constitution.

They were not "used to overawe colored people" (or any law-abiding people) or "prevent them from voting the democratic ticket." The fact of their presence did not have any such effect. Their presence did not, in any case, intimidate any voter or in the least degree interfere with the voluntary or free exercise of choice in speech or vote, or in any lawful act. The only effect on the election was that their presence checked the violence and intimidation which prevented republicans from freely exercising the right to vote according to their convictions of right and duty.

It is said, in the report submitted by a portion of the committee, that—

"Either the troops were sent to South Carolina (1) without any legal and justifiable cause, for political purposes, and to overawe a portion of the voters, or (2) there was a state of violence and turbulence amounting to insurrection against the government of the State, and which the State authorities could not deal with and restrain.

"If either proposition is taken as the true one, no election held in that State, certainly for members of Congress and presidential electors, who are to participate in making laws for or choosing a Chief Magistrate for the rest of the country, should be recognized as valid."

1. It has already been shown that the troops were sent to the State for a perfectly legal and justifiable cause, and that they were not intended to, and did not, overawe any citizen in the exercise of any lawful right.

2. The proposition that the electoral vote of the State should be rejected if "there was a state of violence and turbulence amounting to insurrection against the government of the State, and which the STATE authorities could not deal with or restrain," is one which finds no sanction in law, reason, or justice.

In such an event the "STATE" had a right to call on the President for military aid to restrain such insurrection, and if restrained by this power it is just as effectual, lawful, and right as if restrained by the "State," and votes given under its protection should be counted.

And if a violent and turbulent minority of the people attempted by insurrection to prevent the majority from giving, by their votes, a full and fair expression of their choice of candidates, but failed in the attempt, it would shock all sense of moral right, justice, and law to say that the real choice of the voters expressed in defiance of such violence should not prevail. And this is precisely what occurred in South Carolina.

The republican voters of the State were largely in the majority.[105] The democratic minority attempted by intimidation, turbulence, violence, and murder to prevent the republican voters from freely and fully exercising their choice at the election. In this they failed. Notwithstanding all the turbulence and violence and outrages of the "rifle clubs," they failed to accomplish that purpose.

The democratic voters of the State were not molested or interfered with in the free exercise of their rights in any respect.[106]

9.—INTIMIDATION AND VIOLENCE AFFECTING THE ELECTION AND AT THE POLLS ON THE DAY OF ELECTION.

On the contrary, the military protection was so inadequate and the violence of the "rifle clubs" so great, that large numbers of republicans either (1) remained away from the polls through intimidation or to avoid danger, or (2) feared to vote or were prevented from doing so after they got to the polls, or (3) voted the democratic ticket by coercion, intimidation, or violence.

1. Republicans remained away from the polls by reason of intimidation or to avoid danger.

This would be a necessary consequence of the condition of affairs already de-

[105] The leading democratic newspaper of Ohio, the Cincinnati Enquirer, of October 26, 1876, thoroughly well posted on this subject, said:

"General Wade Hampton is not only sanguine but confident that he will be elected governor of South Carolina. He is making a vigorous canvass. The State is at peace. The regular soldiers sent down there sympathize with the followers of Wade Hampton. The latter, in a public speech, declared that he would gladly welcome the whole United States Army to the State. Some of the former slaves of the democratic candidate for governor of South Carolina are stumping the State in his behalf. It is believed that not a democratic vote will be lost in the State by the appearance of the military. Twenty thousand colored men will march to the polls, under the protection of the bayonets of the United States Army, and cast their ballots for Hampton and Tilden, for State and national reform. General Hampton counts on beating Chamberlain, the Massachusetts carpet-bagger, by 15,000 majority. The republicans are very much distressed about the prospect of losing seven electoral votes in South Carolina."

scribed. It is shown by many witnesses. Among them the following is presented: Ira W. Rice, clerk of the court at Laurens Court-House, testified:

Question. What do you know, if anything, of threats made by democrats owning land, against republicans living on their lands, in case they should vote the republican ticket?

Answer. I know that threats have been generally made.

Q. Did you hear threats made?

A. Yes; I heard threats made on the day of the election.

Q. What were they?

A. Well, on the day of the election, the employers generally at the box, where I noticed, got near the box where the ballots went in, and when the employés came up to vote they would say if they voted the republican ticket that they should not go back to their plantations, and they would have what they had on the places put out in the road.

Q. The employers were the white democrats?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The employés were colored men—republicans?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who owned the principal part of the lands in your county?

A. The white democrats.

Q. How are the colored men of the county generally employed in working on the lands?

A. They work on the lands for shares of the crops.

Q. What effect did the condition of things which prevailed at a preceding election have in keeping colored republicans from going to the polls to vote on the day of the election?

A. I think it had the effect to keep a great many from the polls, and it forced a good many to vote contrary to their wishes, and a great many that did vote the republican ticket have since been discharged. I know that of my own knowledge. I was up home a week ago, and a great many persons that voted the republican ticket have been discharged in accordance with the threats, and a good many have been discharged and have not received their portion of the crop.

Q. Do you know whether they continue to reside at the same places where they resided before the election?

A. They had moved. One family that I speak of now had moved, and the other had been out hunting a home, and hadn't been able to find one.

Q. Were you a candidate for any office at the last election?

A. Yes, sir; I was a candidate for re-election as county clerk.

Q. Where have you lived since the election?

A. I have been in Columbia pretty much since the election. I went up about ten days ago, or intended to return home about ten days ago. I didn't get to the court-house. I got within eighteen miles of it, to the place where I am interested in the rent of, and I stopped there a day or two. That is as far as I got.

Q. Why didn't you go to the court-house?

A. Well, I was afraid to go; I was attacked while there.

Q. By whom were you attacked?

A. By white democrats, I suppose; at least, I would be willing to swear that they were, although I did not see them. The parties attacking me came after eleven o'clock, surrounded the house, and commenced shooting in with Winchester rifles. Several balls took effect in the wall close by where I was, and after firing commenced the men on the plantation there heard it and came to my assistance. The parties were out in the yard. Two of them had got inside of the gate, and the others were out on the road on horseback. They fired fifteen or twenty shots. I think the parties that fired walked in the yard and saw pretty nearly where I was, because the balls came near where I was; one of them struck the chair I had rose from, and next morning I saw the tracks in the yard.

Q. How were the shots fired into the building?

A. It was a room attached to the main building, and the shots came through the door into the opposite side.

Q. What kind of a door was it?

A. It was a door made of boards; not quite so thick as these doors; there was a little crack under the door where you could see my position.

Q. How near to you did their shots come, besides the one that struck the chair on which you were sitting?

A. Three of the balls came very near my head, and went into the wall about where my head would have been leaning against the wall.

The fact that republicans remained away from the polls is admitted on all hands. General M. W. Gary, a leading democrat in Edgefield, in a published card, stated that about six hundred colored voters did not vote in that county. (Appendix F to these views.) This is confirmed by affidavits of the voters. (Appendix, p. 172, to Part 1 of Evidence.)

2. Republicans at the polls left without voting by reason of intimidation and fear of violence.

Upon this subject the following appears among much other of similar import in the evidence taken by the committee:

J. W. BRITT (colored) sworn and examined:

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. State your age and residence.

Answer. I am twenty-one; I live at Saint Charlotte's.

Q. Did you vote on the day of the last presidential election?

A. Yes; at Saint Charlotte's, Bordeaux.

Q. What, if anything, do you know about threats being made against republicans in case they should vote the republican ticket?

A. On the morning of the election there were fifty of us in the crowd, and we met fifty armed men with rifles and sixteen-shooters and pistols; they met us at the cross-roads, about half a mile from the box. They turned our men back, and told them if they were going there to vote for that thieving son of a bitch, Chamberlain, they could not go to that box unless they would go and vote for Wade Hampton and good government. There was fifty colored men turned back, and there was fifty red-shirt armed men there to turn them back. We all started back together, but I went around through the woods and got up to the box anyhow. There was a man named Jim Ransom, with a sixteen-shooter on his shoulder and a pistol in his hand, and he hallooed out, "God damn you, you are all here to-day." We went up to the box. He asked who I was going to vote for. I told him I didn't know who I was going to vote for yet. Says he, "If you vote for that damned thieving Chamberlain there is going to be blood spilt." I said, "I don't know, Mr. Ransom, who I am going to vote for." He was from Georgia. He hands me a democratic ticket, and says, "You vote that ticket." I says, "I don't know whether I will or not." I had a republican ticket in my pocket, and I put the democratic ticket in my pocket and voted the republican ticket. I knew if I showed him the republican ticket he would kill me, for he said so; and he sent word to the manager, Jake Hammond, if he was going to vote the republican ticket to bring his coffin with him.

Q. Did any of those fifty colored men who were turned back vote?

A. There didn't none of those fifty men go and vote but me. Jake Hammond, the marshal, came down to Captain Jones's place, and about fifty of them came there to hunt for that marshal. They asked us where that damned marshal was. We told them that he went down to Green's Corners. The marshal did go in that direction.

Q. Do you know this of your own knowledge?

A. Yes, sir; I know this myself.

Q. You were there?

A. Yes; I was there. I ain't telling more than I know. We were standing there and several of them got upon the stand to go and vote, and Ransom jerked them down. Says he, "Let me see the ticket you are voting." Says he, "They sent me from Georgia to have this election run out fair and square for Hampton to-day, and I am going to have it done or I will kill some damned radical;" and he marched all day with his sixteen-shooter on his shoulder and his pistol in his hand.

Q. What do you know of other colored voters going to that place to vote and coming away without voting?

A. There was one hundred and fifty that came to that box that day and did not get to vote. The Sunday before the election Felix Turner was going to be manager at the election, and they came to the church and called him out. They said they wanted to see him.

Q. Were you there?

A. Yes, sir; I was there at church.

Q. You heard it?

A. Yes; I heard it. Says he, "What do you want of me?" Says they, "Never mind; God damn you, come out here;" and McIntosh said, "Come here, Felix, we we ain't going to hurt you." When he came out a fellow named Ed Newbett struck Felix and knocked him down. His wife, she broke and ran. She jumped over the fence, and the ball struck right in the rail.

Q. Was Felix a republican?

A. Ed said, when he struck him, "I am knocking the damned republicanism out of you now. I want you to vote for good government on Tuesday."

B. B. HUGHES (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you live and what is your age?

Answer. I live in Barnwell County, at Allendale; I was thirty-eight years of age last October

Q. Where were you on the day of the presidential election last November?

A. At Allendale, in Barnwell County.

Q. State what you know, if anything, respecting voters being driven away from the polls or denied the right to vote.

A. On the morning of the election I got to the polls between five and six o'clock to act as United States deputy marshal, for which I was commissioned. The democrats had the polls in possession when I got there, captured—between two and three hundred of them. Between nine and ten o'clock, or maybe later, I asked them would they not give the republicans a chance to vote on that day. The answer was 'turned to me, "Damn the republicans and you, too!" I waited until twelve or one o'clock. I then goes to Captain McLaghlan. He comes to the poll with me. After he came the whites would come to the door that we went in at and locked the door that we went out, and they then would bring in the democrats—bring in men at the side door, and obstruct the way of the colored people voting. I then came out. I found between two and three hundred men going off that had not voted. I said to them, "Men, this will not do! See! come back and vote." Says they, "They will be here until night, and we can't get to vote, and we may be killed on the wayside as we go home." I then goes to Captain McLaghlan again. Captain McLaghlan said to me, says he, "If you call for the Federal troops to come out I will have to turn them out; but," says he, "if there is any way to stop the Federal troops from going out, let us do it." He came down himself about that time. The white people then entirely backed off from the polls while he was present. As soon as he left they taken possession again.

Q. How soon did he leave?

A. I suppose in about twenty-five or thirty minutes. They then said, "Our object is that none of you vote here unless you vote for Wade Hampton." About that time two or three dozen of them got at me with their pistols pointed on me, some of the parties.

Q. Democrats or republicans?

A. Democrats, white men. I was then surrounded by a gang of colored men and carried over to Captain McLaghlan's room at the hotel.

Q. What do you know, if anything, of republicans going away from the polls and not voting?

A. There was between two and three hundred, to the best of my knowledge, didn't vote at all.

Q. What was the reason?

A. There were men there what drew their pistols and made threats and said they should not vote, and one thing and another, and kept kicking up a row, drinking, and going all day long, and it seems they were scared away, some of them, and some parties said they would go off rather than be killed on their way home.

Q. State if any threats were made against republicans.

A. They were.

Q. What, if anything, was said by any parties about not renting land to republicans in case they voted the republican ticket?

A. That was a neighborhood chat among them. That has been told to me myself very often; in other words, I know parties who were discharged from off the places on that account.

Q. State if any of the democrats told you that they would discharge republicans from their lands if they did vote the republican ticket.

A. They did, sir.

Q. Did you hear anything of the sort?

A. I did.

Q. What time in the afternoon or evening did those republicans go away from the polls without voting?

A. They began to leave the polls from twelve until late in the afternoon.

Q. How far was it to any other polling-place?

A. I think one was about eight miles, and the other between six and eight, the two highest.

Q. State what numbers of armed men there were there, if any.

A. There was a good many men there armed with pistols on that day.

Q. Republicans or democrats?

A. Democrats—white men.

Q. State how they were divided, the white men and the colored men, generally; who were the democrats and who were the republicans?

A. Well, the white men were the democrats and the colored men were the republicans, of course.

Q. State the reason why you have not been at home since the election as you were before.

A. The democrats told me that if I staid about there they would kill me.

It should be observed this was at a place where there were thirty-three United States soldiers near by; even their presence did not secure to the republicans their rights.[107]

PARIS SIMPKINS (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. At Edgefield Court House. I was born and raised in Abbeville. I am twenty-seven years old.

Q. What offices, if any, have you held?

A. I have represented that county twice in the General Assembly of this State, the lower house.

Q. Were you a candidate for re-election at the last election, on the 7th of November?

A. With the consent of the committee I will read a statement that I would like to make, and afterward, if they choose to ask any questions, they can do so.

Q. Who prepared it?

A. I prepared it, from what transpired under my own observation.

The witness read the statement, as follows:

"I am a resident of Edgefield County; have lived there all my life. I have represented that county twice in the Legislature of this State; was a candidate for re-election at the last general election which was held on the 7th day of November. I was at the polls on election day for the purpose of voting the republican ticket, but did not have the privilege of doing so. The polls at Edgefield Court House, where I was, Nos. 1 and 2, were blocked, and otherwise crowded by armed democrats, who were uniformed in red shirts, and from one to two pistols buckled on the outside, and some with sixteen-shooters strapped to their sides, the major part of them being mounted on horses, and using threats of a violent nature toward republicans who would present themselves for the purpose of voting the republican ticket. After witnessing for several hours the violent and formidable demonstrations of the democrats to overawe and deter republican voters, and knowing, as I did, that my life had been previously threatened by the democrats for political reasons, I came to the conclusion that if I voted the republican ticket I would be murdered. I know the fact that at least six or eight hundred republicans at Edgefield Court House, who were at the polls for the purpose of voting the republican ticket, were prevented from doing so. I am quite sure if they had wanted to vote the democratic ticket they could have done so with perfect safety. I know I could have voted the democratic ticket with perfect ease if I had so desired it. I saw a large number of republicans make several efforts to vote during the day at box No. 1, but as they would get near the polls the democrats would immediately rush around the place of entrance and keep the republicans back. The democrats had all voted, but, notwithstanding this, they stood there armed and equipped as so many sentinels placed there for the specific object of preventing republicans from voting. During the day the democrats, who were mounted, would gallop from box to box, sometimes yelling and brandishing their pistols. At about three o'clock in the afternoon, the democrats organized a democratic meeting on the court-house steps, the place of entrance to the polling-precinct No. 1, at which several candidates on the democratic ticket made speeches. This was kept up until the polls were closed. During all this time republicans made repeated efforts to vote, but were not allowed to go up the steps. I would state further, in order to show to what extent the republican leaders were intimidated by the threats and violent demonstrations of the democrats, because of their political sentiments and party fealty, that it was utterly impossible to canvass the county in the interest of the Hayes and Wheeler electors, Congressmen, or State officers. On the day of the election I saw several republicans who had been violently assaulted and beaten over the head with pistols, and severe wounds inflicted on them, because they had endeavored to vote the republican ticket. The vote of the county is largely in excess of that of any previous election. There were about 3,000 votes polled over and above what we were legally entitled to by the census which was recently taken. The majority of the census-takers of Edgefield County were democrats; that census gives the colored men a majority over the white men of 1,678. Republicans were publicly threatened with being discharged from employment, and the probability of being killed if they persisted in giving their support to the candidates on the republican ticket."

JESSE JONES (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside, and what is your age?

Answer. I reside at Edgefield Court House. I am twenty-five years old, and have lived there all my life.

Q. State what you know about any violence or intimidation against any republicans during the recent campaign or during the election.

A. I was commissioner of elections. There was box No. 1 and box No. 2 at Edgefield Court House. On the morning of the 7th of November I arose at six o'clock and went to box No. 1 to vote. I was there until ten o'clock. I suppose at least two thousand colored men waited there until nine or ten in the day before a single man of them voted. The polls were surrounded by about four or five hundred white men, with red shirts, and on horses, a great many of them round the door and preventing colored men from getting up the steps. Then there was a great many dismounted round the box, and they said that no Chamberlain men should vote there. We made an application to the marshal to see General Brannan, who was in command, to see if we could get a detachment of troops to enable some of the colored men to go and vote. There was complaint made to me several times, and he finally said, the last time, "Who is surrounding the polls?" They says, "The white men have surrounded the polls, and no colored man can vote." He says, "Well, you must know those are white men." He seemed to speak as if they were privileged to vote. Senator Cain, from Edgefield, and myself, and the other commissioner of election went down to General Brannan and asked him to send up some troops; that we had at least three or four hundred men there to try to vote. The white men had completed their voting at box No. 1, but they surrounded the polls to prevent others from voting, and we asked him to send up troops. He just stood in the door and would not say whether he would send them or not; and while we was asking, three or four of the leading democrats in town came up to where we was standing and said to him, "By God, your men have voted already; and, by God, you sha'n't vote; 'tis a damn trick you are playing." While the conversation was going on the crowd of colored men held up their right hands and swore they had not voted that day. Some of the white men cursed and swore in the presence of General Brannan, and offered $100 to some parties that was holding him to turn him loose to fight him in the presence of the troops. There was very little protection from the troops. We staid there until near ten o'clock, and not a single colored man voted there. We went up to the school-house to box No. 2. There had not been any troops sent there at all until about ten or eleven o'clock, and the white men were there with large hickory clubs, ax-helves, and pistols, and Remington rifles. They had a whole wagon-load of arms standing off about twenty yards from the grounds. They all stood around the box, and no colored man was permitted to vote. Some tried to go in to vote, but they were beaten with sticks and the blood knocked out of their heads. That was about eleven o'clock. We sent up to see if we could not get troops, and Major Kellogg went up to the box, and no colored man was permitted to vote until he got there. At that box we had about five hundred majority—the only box in the county. We have always had, in Edgefield, at these two boxes, about fifteen hundred at least.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of colored men going away from the polls without getting an opportunity to vote?

A. I know, I think, at least eight hundred that left the polls. They staid there until nearly six o'clock and found it was impossible to vote, and then they left. I didn't vote, and I tried from six o'clock in the morning until six o'clock in the afternoon.

3. Republicans voted democratic ticket by reason of intimidation or fear of violence.

This results so inevitably from the condition of affairs proved to have existed that it seems unnecessary to refer to the evidence in detail beyond that which already appears.

It has already been shown that the United States troops in no way interfered with any citizen in the free exercise of any lawful right, and that it was universally understood they had no purpose to do so.

It is shown, however, that the presence of troops to some limited extent gave colored citizens an assurance of protection, which enabled them to vote as they desired, and that this arrested, in some degree, the effect which intimidation and violence was having to drive them over to the support of the democratic candidates against their convictions of right and duty.[108]

DEMOCRATS POLLED MORE THAN THEIR FULL PARTY STRENGTH.

It is very certain there was nothing operating in the State which interfered with any lawful agency in behalf of any democratic candidate.

Every citizen who desired to vote for the democratic candidates did so, and, as we have already seen, many were coerced to do so against their will by the means already stated.

To this was added some fraudulent votes by citizens of Georgia.[109]

The fact that the democratic vote was enlarged by intimidation and coercion is shown not only by the direct evidence already adverted to, but by the results. The usual republican majority of the State was cut down from about 30,000 to about 1,000.[110]

* New county. † Record of white and colored votes not kept. ‡ Add for Charleston census: Number of whites, 7,398; colored, 17,667.

The annexed table of census and votes shows that in Edgefield County there were 2,252 votes more than were voters in the county, and in Laurens 657.

A comparison of the vote of 1876 with that of previous years in Edgefield, Laurens, and other counties shows not only great frauds, but that colored citizens in large numbers must have been intimidated into voting for the democratic candidates. It is impossible to conceive of a change so great in any other mode.[111]

It is very clear, then, that there is no reason for rejecting the electoral vote of South Carolina.

The agencies employed to defraud the lawful republican majority of the State out of their just rights surpass in enormity anything ever before attempted. The attempt to bribe William B. Nash, one of the republican electors, to vote for Tilden for President is clearly proved.[112]

It is sufficiently shown that D. H. Chamberlain, the republican candidate for governor, was elected over Wade Hampton, the democratic candidate, and that the republicans had a majority for all the candidates for State offices and for members of each branch of the Legislature.[113]

The Legislature was duly organized, the returns of the election for governor were duly "returned to the speaker of the house of representatives," who, as the constitution requires, did "open and publish them in the presence of both houses," and Chamberlain was declared elected and duly inaugurated. The two houses occupied the proper legislative halls in the capitol.

It was never pretended that any organized senate existed which did or could hear any returns published for Hampton. The fragmentary house which professed to declare him elected never had the election returns. It met in a private hall, and had no more authority than a town meeting, because there could be but one legal house. But, notwithstanding this, a fragment of the members of the house of representatives, without any authority, organized as a pretended house, a mere revolutionary body, and without a senate, proceeded to go through the form of inaugurating Wade Hampton as governor, and, with a few members of the senate, pretended to go through the forms of electing as United States senator General M. C. Butler, whose relations to the infamous Hamburgh massacre have been the subject of so much newspaper and other discussion and comment. The two legal, constitutional, and regularly organized houses of the general assembly elected in proper form Hon. D. T. Corbin, a gentleman of high character, integrity, and talents, as United States Senator, and he has been duly commissioned as such. The general assembly has adjourned. Governor Chamberlain, duly inaugurated and installed in office, is acting as governor, has the great seal of the State, and occupies the executive office in the capitol, while Wade Hampton is assuming also to act as such. In various forms the right of the rival claimants to act is before the courts. One of the circuit courts has decided that Chamberlain is in fact governor. Another has undertaken, in a collateral way, to decide he is not. (See Appendix to evidence, part 1.) But this is so manifestly without authority that it cannot be sustained. Upon the principles already shown, the decision of the speaker of the house in the presence of the two houses of the General Assembly is conclusive as to who is governor. The two houses are authorized to canvass the votes, and the result as declared by them cannot be called in question. (constitution, article 3, section 4,) except by a direct proceeding to contest the right to the office, as provided by the constitution and statutes of the State. (Constitution, article 3, section 4; revised statutes of 1873, page 32 section 28; Chase's Decisions by Johnson, Griffin case, 402.) The authorities already cited prove this. Bean vs. Thompson, 19 New Hampshire, 115; Ballou vs. Bangs, 24 Illinois, 184; Taylor vs. Skinner, 2 South Carolina, 696; State vs. Bloom, 17 Wisconsin, 54; the decisions of the electoral commission under the act of Congress of January 29, 1877, also prove it.

While this conflict, in the form described, is going on, anarchy and confusion prevail to a great degree all over the State. The determined resistance to law and lawful authority and the revolutionary condition of the people are producing disastrous results. These could be averted by quiet submission to lawful authority, which would restore peace, bring order out of anarchy, revive the prostrate industries of the State, bring happiness and prosperity to the people, and develop the wealth and resources which are so abundant in the genial climate of South Carolina.

It is well settled in all the authorities on evidence that it is the duty of the courts, and they are bound to judicially know the officers of the State. They are bound to know the great seal of the State. It requires no proof. There can be but one seal. Whoever, under color of right, occupies the executive office, acts as governor, and authenticates his acts with the great seal, is, in law, governor. There would be no order or peace if every pretender could assert a right to office collaterally in proceedings in court. Law and public policy forbid it.

The courts cannot inquire whether the regularly-acting houses of the General Assembly are lawfully organized. They have so decided themselves, and that decision is final. This is a political question, with which courts cannot interfere. Courts only have judicial power. The power to determine the organization of the General Assembly is political. Courts can neither make nor unmake legislatures. (Paschal, Annotated Constitution, pages 189–194, notes, 195–199; Scott vs. Jones, 5 Howard, 374; Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 57; Missis-ippi vs. Johnson, 4 Wallace, 500.) The constitution of the State settles this question. By it each house is made the exclusive "judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members."

This is certain from another consideration:

It rests with Congress to decide what is the established government in a State. (7 Howard, 57.) Until Congress acts, the President must decide, whenever called upon by the governor for troops, in pursuance of the Constitution. And State courts cannot control Congress or the President. The President has recognized Governor Chamberlain as the lawful executive, and this is conclusive until otherwise determined by Congress, or by a "contest," in pursuance of the Constitution and laws.

But the men who control the democratic party seem determined to maintain a condition of anarchy. They are refusing to pay taxes and otherwise to yield to the

---

The Columbia Herald and Union, of January 24, 1876, shows the democratic frauds as follows:

In the table the classification of votes as to color is omitted in the county of Charleston, as it did not appear on the managers' returns. This is also true of the counties of Edgefield and Laurens.

In the county of Wuliamsburgh the classification appeared in the returns of the managers, except from two precincts.

In the last three mentioned counties this classification has been approximated, that process being possible on the reasonable assumption that those who voted for the republican candidate for governor were almost without exception colored men.

This approximation could not fairly obtain, however, in the case of Charleston County, because there is a considerable white republican element there.

Edgefield County is approximated as follows:

Colored voters by census of 1875	4,400
Votes cast for Chamberlain	3,107
Leaving number of colored voters unaccounted for	1,293
Votes cast for Hampton	6,267
Assuming that the colored votes as per census, yet to be accounted for, were cast for him, viz	1,293
And there appears as the actual white vote	4,974
Deduct the actual white vote as per census	2,722
And there remains to be accounted for as white votes in excess of the census	2,252

The fraud in this county stares boldly forth.

Laurens County is approximated as follows:

Number of colored votes as per census	2,844
Colored votes estimated to have been cast	1,804
Colored votes unaccounted for	1,040
Number of votes cast for Hampton	2,916
White voters as per census	2,259
Excess of white voters over census	557

But assuming that these 657 represent colored voters, and deducting them from the 1,040 colored voters unaccounted for, there still remain 383 colored voters unaccounted for, as per census.

Williamsburgh County is approximated as follows:

In this county there are eleven precincts. From one precinct where 157 votes were cast (as deducted from the county canvassers' returns) no managers' returns were sent up, hence no classification of the voters, as to color, can be made. At another precinct the classification of voters (as to color) is not made, but it can be reasonably assumed that the 125 voters for Hampton were white and the 245 for Chamberlain were colored. Adding the votes cast at the latter precinct to those cast at the other nine which are classified on the managers' returns, there is exhibited an aggregate of 1,529 white and 2,506 colored voters, or an excess of 117 whites over, and a deficiency of 70 colored from, the census.

Colleton County: It is to be remarked in connection with the statistics of the election in this county, that while the colored vote is 511 in excess of the census, the vote for Chamberlain is 54 less than the census of the colored voters and 565 less than the actual number of colored votes cast, while Hampton received 33 more votes than all the white votes cast, with the 511 colored excess added thereto.

In Orangeburgh County, where the aggregate excess of votes over the census was 788, Chamberlain received only 85 votes in excess of the colored vote, according to that census, and 332 less than the number of colored votes actually cast, while Hampton received 689 votes more than the whole number of white voters according to the census; 318 more than the whole number of white votes actually cast, and only 99 votes less than the total white vote cast, with the whole excess of the colored vote added to it.

If in Charleston County we deduct 1,000 votes from Hampton, as representing the white republican element, and give them to Chamberlain, and then deduct the same number of votes from Chamberlain and give them to Hampton, as the number of colored men who voted for him, the result remains substantially the same as to the excess of white (or Hampton) votes over, and the deficiency of colored or (Chamberlain) votes from, the census.

The difference between the total number of "votes cast in 1876," with the addition of the votes in Charleston, and the total vote cast for governor, represents the "scattering" vote in the State; or, in other words, the votes cast for persons other than Chamberlain or Hampton was 634.

The deficiency of 10,747 colored votes from the census is accounted for substantially by adding to the 8,727 votes in the column of "colored less than census" the 3,655 ascertained by deducting the colored vote received by Chamberlain in Charleston County from the colored census of that county.

The data in the table are official. Even on the extraordinary assumption that Hampton received every white vote in the State, according to the census, except the 1,000 accredited to Chamberlain in Charleston County, the pertinent inquiry remains, "Where did he get the 6,531 white votes which are obviously in excess of the census?"

[111] Upon this subject see "Report of the special committee of the house of representatives of South Carolina relative to the organization of that body and the constitutional validity thereof, adopted December 21, 1876," appended to these views as "Appendix F."

[112] See evidence, part 1, page 456.

To this may be added the fact that in advance of the meeting of the electoral college it was understood and proclaimed in democratic circles that the attempt would be made successful, as shown by the following extract, offered to be submitted to the committee in connection with the evidence of William Beverly Nash, January 22, 1877, from the Greenville Daily News, Greenville, South Carolina, Thursday, December 7, 1876:

TELEGRAPHIC.—NOON DISPATCHES TO COLUMBIA.

[Special to the Daily News.]

"COLUMBIA, December 6,

"The supreme court recognizes Wallace, and pronounces Mackey a private citizen.

"The democratic house organizes with a quorum of 63 members.

"The circuit court quashed the indictment against the Aiken rioters.

"Beverly Nash, republican elector, will cast his vote for Tilden to-day.

"R. H. K."

In addition to this, the party who attempted the bribery was duly summoned to appear before the committee at Columbia when entirely able to attend, and he refused. He was again summoned to appear in Washington, and refused. It is alleged in the report of the majority that he has sent an affidavit denying the allegations or evidence of Nash. But the so-called affidavit is not so authenticated as to show it to be genuine. It does not contradict the evidence of Nash, but is a mere evasion; it does not deny the interview with Nash, but admits it, and says:

"It is possible that deponent adverted to the fact, very generally discussed at the time, that there was large pecuniary interests, arising principally from betting, so affected by the election that many apprehended that large sums of money would be used to purchase votes."

The so-called statement of a physician as to the sickness of this party is without evidence of authenticity and is not under oath. Mr. Nash, the elector, is a highly respectable citizen, and no attempt has been made to impeach his reputation or character in any respect. His industry, energy, and honesty have enabled him to attain a high position for integrity and intelligence as one of the substantial citizens of Columbia and as a man of property and business capacity.

[113] See Appendix F to these views. Also the legislative journals, Appendixes G and H, and the "Proceedings of the pretended or 'Wallace' house of representatives," as published by the members thereof, Appendix I. Proceedings were instituted in the supreme court to contest the election of the republican State officers. These will be found in the appendix to the evidence (part 1) taken by the committee. It is well known that the court sympathized with and favored Hampton, the democratic candidate for governor, in his pretensions, but the referee appointed by the court to ascertain the vote of the State, after the most careful examination and upon full sworn testimony, made a report, including the following statement: [See tabular statement on next page.]

lawful "powers that be."[114] Hampton, without the shadow of law for his action, has assumed to appoint agents to collect taxes.

Labor is disorganized, industry is paralyzed, animosities and hostilities are engendered, and not only South Carolina and her people suffer, but the whole country. The people of each State are interested in the prosperity of all. The whole people are interested in having the cotton and rice crops of South Carolina abundant to supply their wants and to enable the people of that State to buy the products of other States. There is not and should not be, in any State among the people any feeling of hostility to South Carolina. They would all rejoice to know that her troubles were at an end. Their interests require, and the higher and holier motives of humanity demand, that there be an end of this condition of things. One or the other party must yield. The contest cannot continue always. To permit the overthrow of the State government by the minority democratic party, unsuccessful as they were in the recent contest, is but to invite similar attempts by defeated minorities hereafter. It would establish a precedent which would inevitably "return to plague the inventors." There is but one safe solution of the difficulty, and that is to recognize the officers declared elected in the forms prescribed by the constitution and laws. All who would otherwise advise are in effect, if not in fact, the [114] This will be seen from the following address of the State democratic executive committee:

COLUMBIA, December 15.

The following address was issued to-day by the State committee:

ROOMS STATE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

To the Democratic Party of South Carolina:

The inauguration of Governor Hampton and Lieutenant-Governor Simpson concluded the labors which the recent campaign devolved upon the State executive committee of the democratic party, and we take occasion to express our gratitude to the democracy of South Carolina for its unwavering support of every measure proposed, and our admiration of that spirit of forbearance, subordination, and fortitude which has secured universal praise. Amid the exciting and aggravating incidents of a most momentous struggle, enthusiasm has been tempered with prudence, zeal with calm judgment, and we are confident that the sublime patience so sorely tried by the events of the last eight years will still be exercised until the end.

The fruits of our victory are sought to be wrested from our grasp, and a usurping body, whose only prop is Federal bayonets, seeks to control the State. We feel assured that our government, which represents the will of the people, and is based upon the consent of the governed, will speedily become the recognized government in the State, as we firmly believe that the indignant protest of the entire people of these United States who are not slaves to party prejudices will sustain our action and vindicate our cause.

Our campaign has been conducted upon the basis laid down by our honored chieftain at the outset, and through peaceful and lawful agencies we won the victory, acknowledging the legal and political rights of all classes, and pledging ourselves to maintain them inviolate. We know that every pledge of the party will be redeemed. With kind feelings for the masses of the opposition, we must exercise magnanimity toward them. Generosity demands that proscription shall not be visited upon the rank and file of the opposite party, and we earnestly recommend that steps be taken at once to guarantee protection to laborers in every county in the State. Governor Hampton heartily concurs in this recommendation, and we have his authority to make it known to the public.

Under the severe trials of the present hour let fortitude mark the conduct of our party, and we urge every Carolinian, without regard to political affiliations, STRICTLY TO REFUSE ALLEGIANCE TO THE MONSTROUS USURPATION CLAIMING TO EXERCISE THE FUNCTIONS OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT, FIRMLY RESOLVING NEVER TO CONTRIBUTE ONE DOLLAR OF TAXATION FOR ITS SUSTENANCE, and steadily maintaining the verdict of the people at the ballot-box. Every interest of the present and every hope of the future age, the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the State for generations, demand a firm, unwavering, and persistent determination, never, under any circumstances, to recognize the pretended authority of a degraded and disgraced man, whose slander and vituperation of our people will always be remembered as the emanations of a vindictive and baffled politician and adventurer thwarted in an unholy ambition. THE ISSUE MUST BE MADE, AND TO YIELD IS TO SEAL THE POLITICAL FATE OF A BRAVE PEOPLE.

In conclusion we upon every one to resume the ordinary routine of business, and seek to widen the avenues of material prosperity, confiding their cause to the wisdom and conservatism of our beloved chief magistrate, whose course has won the confidence and excited the admiration of the civilized world. Under his guidance and protection the issue will eventuate in the complete freedom of our hopes and aspirations, unless constitutional liberty has perished in America.

On the 29th January, 1877, the following dispatches were received at Washington from South Carolina:

"ANOTHER WAR OF RACES.

"Information of another war of races in South Carolina is received here to-day. It seems that Holloway, a colored justice of the peace, holding an appointment given him by Chamberlain, at Timmonsville, Darlington County, was requested by the whites to resign and make place for a justice appointed by Hampton. Holloway refused to do so, and on Saturday morning about two o'clock was called from his bed by a rifle club and murdered. When the negroes heard of the assassination the next morning there was great excitement, and, seizing their arms, they took to the woods, supposing Holloway's murder to be the signal for another Hamburgh affair. The whites raised the cry of "negro insurrection," swore in a rifle club as special policemen, and pursued them. Sunday night there was a slight collision, several being wounded. It is feared that more bloodshed will follow, but General Ruger has sent troops to the scene and may prevent it."

"NEW YORK, January 29.

"A Columbia (South Carolina) dispatch says: "At two o'clock a. m. on the 27th, at Timmonsville, B. O. Holloway, the Chamberlain trial-justice, was shot by unknown parties, near his door. The assassination fired the blacks, who immediately armed, and the whites organized a strong police force. The two parties came in collision on the outskirts of the town early yesterday morning, and the result was that two special policemen were wounded, when the whole force returned to town."

The following further shows the condition of affairs:

"ANDERSON, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 29, 1877.

"On Saturday a large number of republicans of Anderson assembled at the Greeley Institute to consider the political situation of the State. There were between six and seven hundred people present. G. D. Williams was made chairman and Henry Harrison was elected secretary. Several pointed addresses were made, after which appropriate resolutions were adopted, expressing loyalty to the government of D. H. Chamberlain as the only legal government in the State, resolving to pay taxes to him and none other, and agreeing to obey only his officers.

real enemies of the people of South Carolina. The effort at resistance now being made is only a prolongation of the spirit of rebellion applied to the internal affairs of the State. The people have had enough of this. It is high time to profit by experience. These difficulties are already beginning to drive laborers from the State. Others will inevitably follow if violence and lawlessness continue. As this process will go on, cultivated fields will become wilderness, and desolation will reign where there should be the happy abodes of civilized men. This condition of affairs long continued would leave the State but one remove above barbarism.

If the colored people, whose labor is so much needed in the State, could be driven from it by intimidation, terrorism, violence, and murder, their exodus would be followed by terrible retribution. The resources of the State would be undeveloped and all products of industry be largely reduced. The art of intimidation would not perish; rival parties among the white people would turn upon each other the practices which they in common have employed upon the unfortunate colored inhabitants. Internecine strife would continue, and the gloom of desolation and poverty would overshadow this people.

As a means of securing lawful elections in the future, the enforcement of existing laws is essential.

To secure the right of free discussion, the undersigned recommend the passage of a bill, as follows:

"A bill to protect free discussion.

"SECTION 1. That if any person shall by force, threat, menace, intimidation, or otherwise unlawfully prevent any citizen or citizens from assembling in public meeting, to freely discuss or hear discussed the claims or merits of any officer f the Government of the United States, or of any candidate for the office of Presi dent, Vice-President, or elector thereof, or Representative in Congress, or Dele gate in Congress from any Territory, or the laws or measures of Congress, or any measure, existing, pending, or proposed, affecting the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or if any person shall by any such means break up, disperse, or molest any such assemblage, or any citizen in or of such assemblage, when met or meeting to discuss or hear discussion as aforesaid, or shall by any such means prevent any citizen from attending any such assemblage, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall be liable to indictment in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and on conviction thereof shall be adjudged to pay a fine not exceeding $500, or suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and pay the costs of prosecution. And for all purposes of such elections, and the duties in relation thereto or growing out of the same, all such officers are declared to be officers of the United States."

Provision should be made also to prevent the practice of carrying weapons by large numbers of people at political meetings.

We also recommend the adoption of a joint resolution recognizing the government of which D. H. Chamberlain is governor as the lawful government of the State.[115] This is necessary to give security to property and protection for the civil and political rights of citizens.

And we recommend the adoption of the following:

"Resolved, That C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers were duly appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of South Carolina at the election in that State, November 7, 1876, and that their votes for President and Vice-President, duly authenticated, should be counted."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.
N. P. BANKS.
E. G. LAPHAM.

[The Appendices A to I, both inclusive, referred to in the foregoing views will appear in House Report No. 175, Part 2, Forty-fourth Congress, second session, in their proper place, but are omitted in the RECORD.]

A meeting was held here also by the laborers of the county to protest against the wicked, persecuting spirit manifested by the leading land-owners and capitalists, who evidently desire to reduce free laborers again to a state of slavery.

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

We, the colored laborers, farmers, and mechanics of Anderson County, met in convention to consider the action of our white fellow-citizens, taken in a convention recently held at the call of the democratic executive committee, upon the subject of labor and in favor of proscription for opinions' sake, as men and as lovers of our own freedom feel that it is our duty to condemn and expose the oppressions sought to be imposed on American citizens because of their political opinions. We, as laborers, denounce as false all charges that we are actuated by hatred to our employers; nothing that we have said or done can warrant this assault upon us by white capitalists. We have been true to them for years as laborers; we were faithful to them in the late war and have been faithful since; it was our labor which kept alive a government organized to enslave us; we fed and sustained a soldiery which fought to keep us from freedom; we worked for their wives and little ones in their absence; it was our labor which maintained the widows and orphans of those fighting against our interests; it was our labor that built their fine dwellings; it was our labor which made their forts in Charleston as bulwarks against our freedom; it was our labor which educated their children, which built the railroads, which made the South what she is.

Knowing these things to be true, and that no malice has ever laid in our hearts against those who held us in slavery, that our conduct has been magnanimous and forgiving, we feel the present treatment of the white people as ungrateful and unjust. We, therefore, meet to protest against all attempts to curtail our right of free opinion and a free ballot, and adopt the following resolutions:

"Whereas the white landlords of Anderson County met in convention some time since and passed the following extreme resolutions to our detriment, namely:

"Resolved, That this convention adopt the actions of the labor question with the addition that republicans who supported the Hampton government and refuse to pay taxes to the Chamberlain government and who join the clubs be treated as democrats.

"Resolved, That the executive committee suggest that every democrat in the county be earnestly requested not to give any employment or patronage in any manner to such men as were prominent republicans, party or local leaders in the recent election, and that all assistance and encouragements be withheld from them.

"Resolved, That the treatment of the rank and file of the republican party be left unacted upon by our people for the present, and that after the 1st day of January next, if General Hampton is inaugurated governor, our people should be magnanimous to the rank and file of the republicans of this county, and that they be employed upon such differences between them and democrats as may be fixed upon by the different clubs to secure a just, deserved, and promised advantage to those who voted the democratic ticket.

"Resolved, That with a view to carrying out the foregoing recommendation we suggest that a complete list of all the voters in the late election be published forthwith in pamphlet or circular form; that the name of every democrat be printed in one list, by precinct, with the letter (W) or (C) to denote white or colored, and that the names of every republican be printed in another list, by precincts, with the letter (W) and (C) to denote white and colored, and that the names of all republican leaders be distinguished from the rank and file of the party by having an asterisk opposite to them, and that each club designate who are such leaders in the bounds.

"Resolved, That we recommend that the clubs proceed immediately to enroll the names of all colored men who are willing to join our organization, and that all who join before the 1st day of January next be treated as democrats in the contracts to be made for the coming year."

And whereas since the above resolutions have been circulated among the clubs many of us have been thrown out of employment because we will continue to be republicans, and are subjected to fear of want and other calamities; and whereas we have evidence that many of our fellow-laborers are now living in the woods and old fields, in miserable huts, suffering from cold and want of food, having been driven from their homes because of their political opinions; and whereas we feel that some measures must soon be taken by us to relieve our distresses; and whereas it is evident that we cannot live among the white people of this State and preserve our liberty of opinion and political action, or without incurring their hatred and indignation:

Resolved, That we indorse President Grant's late message to Congress, relative to the annexation of San Domingo to the United States, with a view to make it a home for the freed people of color.

Resolved, That we urge upon the President that he renew his efforts to secure such action by Congress in our behalf.

Resolved, That we ask our Senators and Representatives to give their aid to the President in this cause.

Resolved, That we urge upon our fellow-laborers in other counties of this State, who are similarly persecuted, to meet at an early day, say February 10, to consider what is best to be done to resist or to avoid the calamities sought to be put upon us for political opinion.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, and to our Representatives in Congress, and to Frederick Douglass, esq., that they may use their influence in the cause.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Columbia Union-Herald, the New York Times and Tribune, the Washington Republican, and the Methodist Advocate, of Georgia, and that a copy be sent to the governors of the several States.

SEABORN McCURRY, Chairman.
MOSES LEE, Secretary.

Report of the minority of the subcommittee of which Hon John. F. Philips was chairman.

Hon. MILTON SAYLER, Chairman, &c.:

SIR: The undersigned, a minority of the subcommittee of the committee appointed to investigate the election in South Carolina under the resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 4th day of December last, which subcommittee was appointed at Columbia under and in pursuance of a resolution, of which the following is a copy—

"DECEMBER 19, 1876.

"The question of dividing the committee was called up and agreed on.

"The Chair announced the following subcommittee, Messrs. PHILIPS, EDEN, and LAPHAM, to proceed to Charleston"— begs leave to report that testimony was taken by said subcommittee at the city of Charleston, in said State, between the 20th day of December, 1876, and the 3d day of January, 1877; and from such evidence the undersigned submits the following as the leading facts established thereby, which are in the main chronologically stated:

THE GENERAL CANVASS.

The first republican meeting held in the State to ratify the nominations of the national candidates of the party was at Edgefield Court House on the 12th of August, 1876. The republicans advertised to speak at that meeting were Governor Chamberlain, General SMALLS, a colored member of Congress, Judge Mackey, and Mr. Hayne, the secretary of state. These persons left Columbia on the morning of the 12th of August. As the train reached Edgefield County crowds of white democrats, dressed in red shirts, with revolvers in their belts, were at the stations. They entered the cars inquiring for the governor and that "nigger Congressman." When the party reached Edgefield Court House large crowds of white men were found there and seen coming in from all directions on horseback, hooting and yelling. By reason of this it was decided best that the meeting, which was to have been held at the court-house square, should assemble at the academy grounds, about a mile outside the town. Before removing, a committee of the democrats demanded of the republicans an equal portion of the time at the meeting. To this the republicans replied it was a special meeting called to ratify the nomination of Hayes and Wheeler, and the request was refused. As the republicans formed in line and started, with a band of music, for the academy grove, the democrats, under the command of General Butler, of Hamburgh notoriety, and General Gary and others, also started for the same place. At a street-crossing General Butler ordered the republicans to halt and let the white men pass. In this way they reached and surrounded the platform before the republicans arrived there. What occurred at the meeting is stated by General SMALLS in his evidence, which is uncontradicted:

When we got to the platform General Butler demanded half of the time, and wanted to know whether we were willing to give it, and that if we did not they intended to have it by fair or by foul means. Governor Chamberlain consented that he should have half of the time. Governor Chamberlain was introduced first. We undertook to elect the chairman of the meeting, and General Butler said, "No; we do not want a chairman." He said, "We intend to govern the meeting; it shall be a fair and square one, and every man shall have thirty minutes each to speak." Governor Chamberlain was introduced first. Then the white clubs all sang out, "No, he shall not speak. General Butler must speak first." General Butler got up and told them to be quiet, to hear Governor Chamberlain speak, that he would have the reply. They of course then kept quiet. When Governor Chamberlain had spoken about five minutes, they commenced to interrupt him by calling him all kinds of names.

Question. Where were the white men?

Answer. Around the stage. They rode around the stage, and the republicans had to go behind their horses.

Q. How many of them were there?

A. I should judge between six and eight hundred were there that day.

Q. How were they armed?

A. They were armed with revolvers; some of them having as many as three revolvers buckled to their side.

Q. Did any of them have rifles?

A. One man had.

Q. Was there any use made of revolvers?

A. No, sir; except that they had them in their hands. I myself saw a man on the limb of a tree, right over Governor Chamberlain's head while he was speaking, who had his pistol pointed down at him; and General Gary shook his finger at him to stop. They were hung over the platform in the trees. Then General Butler took the stand and spoke thirty minutes without interruption, and heaped a great mass of abuse upon Mr. Chamberlain. In his speech he asked the crowd whether [115] See in the Congressional Record of January 17, 1877, the petition of Governor Chamberlain and Lieutenant-Governor R. H. Gleaves, asking Congress to uphold the lawful and constitutional executive and legislative departments of the State.

Wade Hampton also presented a similar petition.

they were white-liners, and they answered no. He asked them again if they were Ku-Klux, and they said no. "Well," he says, "there is the man, ROBERT SMALLS, [pointing to me,] who has used my name in the halls of Congress as being the leader of Ku-Klux. I dare him to open his lips on this stand to-day." And the cry was heard from everybody, "Kill the damn son of a bitch! Kill the damn nigger!" After General Butler got through, Judge T. J. Mackey took the stand and spoke about twenty or twenty-five minutes amid a great deal of interruption from the democratic clubs.

Q. Did he speak for the republicans?

A. Yes, sir; he was one of the republican speakers. Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State Hayne, and myself were the republican speakers. After Mackey had gotten through, General Gary took the stand, and his speech was confined principally to abusing Mr. Chamberlain.

Q. Personal abuse, was it?

A. Personal abuse, sir. He charged him with everything. And when he had been speaking about twenty minutes he said to the crowd, "Must I hit him again?" And they said, "Yes; give him some more." And he looked around upon Mr. Chamberlain and said, "You damn bald-headed renegade and bummer of Sherman's army, and now so-called governor of South Carolina!

Judge Mackey then attempted to speak in defense of Governor Chamberlain, but was hooted down by the white men, and General SMALLS was threatened with his life if he attempted to speak, and left without doing so. Over fifteen hundred colored people were at this meeting entirely without arms, while the whites were all armed and mounted on horseback. As the republican speakers were on their return to Columbia, the witness SMALLS describes the scene as follows:

"We got into the cars. They stood all around the windows, and one fellow said, 'Where is that fellow SMALLS; bring him out of the car; let us have him out here.' I sat at the window, but paid no attention to it. Then four or five of them came into the car and walked through, and said, 'Where is that nigger Congressman,' and passed along. One fellow said, 'Here he is;' and he then passed between me and the door and stood up and looked back at me, and said, 'Let us have a lock of his hair.' One of them said, 'No, damn it, he won't come back here again.' Another said, 'Let us get him out and hang him; that is the only way to keep him from coming back here.' With that the conductor pulled the string and the train started off.

"When we got to Johnson's Station another crowd came in the car and went through pretty much the same thing, till we got down to what is called Ridge Spring Station."

SECOND MEETING AT EDGEFIELD COURT HOUSE.

The Republicans held another meeting at Edgefield Court House on the 14th of October, 1876.

This was after the proclamation of Governor Chamberlain commanding the rifle clubs to disperse. Mr. Thompson, a United States commissioner, whose evidence is uncontradicted, thus described the occurrences at this meeting:

Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. Please state the occurrences of the day there without my asking particular questions.

A. I went there as a United States commissioner. There were five or six United States deputy marshals also with the party. This was the first meeting called by the republican executive committee after the nomination of Governor Chamberlain, and they made a point to have these meetings undisturbed, if possible, by the efforts of democrats to what they called "dividing time." They did not intend at that time to divide any time. They intended to have the meeting their own. When the meeting was called for this Saturday by the republican executive committee the democrats in Edgefield postponed several of their meetings and requested——

The CHAIRMAN, (to the witness.) State only facts of your own personal knowledge, and not what you heard.

The WITNESS. I know this from publications in the newspapers. I saw the notices myself. I am the editor of a newspaper. I saw the notices in the newspapers that the democrats were invited to be present at this meeting. It had been asserted in the newspapers that Governor Chamberlain was to address this meeting. He had been advertised to address the meeting, and when we got to Batesville, or Batesburgh, as it is sometimes called, on the Augusta and Columbia Railroad, when the train stopped at the station two or three men came into the cars with uniforms of red shirts, and one of them carrying a pistol in his hand, and walked through and examined everybody in the car. I think three got on there, and there were others outside of the car, on the platform, looking in at the windows and in at the ends of the car, and asking for Chamberlain.

Q. Was he aboard?

A. No, sir, he was not aboard. At other stations, all the way along, these men would get into the car and walk through the car and examine the passengers.

Q. Were these men armed?

A. Yes, sir; armed with pistols.

Q. And uniformed in red shirts?

A. Had their red shirts on. When we got down to Pine House, which was the station you get off at to go to Edgefield, which is eight miles from the railroad, we found a company of United States troops there, and there we got into hacks and drove off, and passed a body of United States troops going into the village. The streets of the village were filling up with bands of men coming in from different sections, on horseback, mounted and in uniform.

Q. What kind of uniform?

A. Red shirts; that is the only kind of uniform they had; soft black hats and red shirts?

Q. You went, then, to the meeting?

A. Yes, sir; we went to the meeting, and got to the meeting about eleven o'clock, I should think. A large gathering of the republicans was held at what they called Academy Grove—an old, dilapidated school-house.

Q. How many were assembled there?

A. I should think there was twelve hundred of them. After one or two speeches had been made, probably an hour and a half after the meeting had assembled, General M. C. Butler rode up to the meeting and asked Colonel Low (who was the chief marshal) if he might bring his men around the republican meeting. Colonel Low replied that he could act on his own responsibility about it; so he rode away, and in a few moments the cavalry commenced filing down the hill toward the meeting. They rode four abreast, and they came down and passed up near where I was standing, and finally encircled the whole meeting. They made a complete circle right around the meeting.

Q. Encircling the stand and all?

A. O, yes, sir; the meeting was right in the center, and they passed completely around it.

Q. Did they include the speakers' stand?

A. Yes, sir; the speakers' stand was in a grove under the trees, and they just encircled the grove, and then they halted a moment, and General Gary proposed three cheers for Hampton and Tilden, and they continued to cheer for a quarter of an hour, I suppose.

Q. How many were there there?

A. I should say there was as many as fifteen or sixteen hundred.

Q. All mounted?

A. All mounted.

Q. How were they uniformed?

A. Every one of them had their red shirts on.

Q. What arms, if any, had they?

A. They had no arms, except pistols, that I could see.

Q. How did they wear their pistols?

A. Generally strapped around them on the outside by a belt.

Q. Each one, or more?

A. Some had more than one, some had two, and some of them had them in their boot-legs.

Q. Revolvers, were they?

A. Yes, sir; they were under excellent discipline.

Q. Who had the command?

A. General Butler was in command. He had General Gary and four or five others as aids, like.

ABBEVILLE COURT HOUSE.

It was also shown that at a republican meeting held at Abbeville Court House on the 18th October, 1876, the democrats in large force were uniformed and armed as at Edgefield, and made similar demonstrations of force and violence, but did not break up the meeting.

BLACKVILLE.

Also, that at a republican meeting at Blackville on the 19th October, 1876, six or eight hundred mounted men, uniformed in the same manner, were present, and to some extent disturbed the meeting.

NEWBERRY.

Also, that at a republican meeting at Newberry, shortly after this, a large crowd of mounted men came to the meeting, and what then occurred was described by the witness Thompson, as follows:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. The next meeting was, you say, where?

Answer. At Newberry.

Q. What day was that?

A. I do not recollect. I think it was the Saturday following that meeting; I think it was.

Q. What time did you get there?

A. We got there about eleven o'clock.

Q. Was there any military companies there?

A. There was one or two companies there of United States soldiers.

Q. How many men?

A. I really do not know; thirty or forty. When we arrived at Newberry there was a very large crowd of both blacks and whites at the station; the whites were uniformed and on horseback.

Q. How many of each, giving your judgment?

A. Well, I should think there was four or five hundred of each.

By Mr. EDEN:

Q. That was at the depot?

A. Yes, sir; right at the depot. As soon as the speakers got out of the cars they started immediately to get to the court-house, where the meeting was to be held. That was right in the middle of the town, and they went up on to the front steps of the court-house to speak. The cavalry moved up on one side of the court-house, and gradually forced the crowd away from in front of the court-house.

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. Were they on horseback?

A. Yes, sir; these red-shirted men.

Q. How many of them were there?

A. Well, I should think there were eight or nine hundred of them by this time, coming in all the time. The republicans were gradually forced around to the side of the building, or to the end of the building rather, so that the speakers could hardly be seen; could not be heard at all. They made a great many attempts to speak; but the noise was so great, and the interruptions were so frequent, they could not be heard.

Q. Noise by whom?

A. Noise by this cavalry in front of the court-house. They were cheering for Hampton, and it was impossible to hear the speakers, and they finally gave it up. A great many attempts were made by the democrats to get the cavalry to go away and let the republicans have their meeting.

Q. That is, by the citizens you mean?

A. By citizens of the town; yes, sir. A great many of them endeavored to do so, but it was impossible; they could not get them to move.

Q. What did they say as to their purpose, if anything?

A. I do not know. I did not come very much in contact with them so as to hear them speak. I saw them several times ride through the republican meeting; bodies of them forced their way through the crowd, and finally the republicans were all driven pretty much out to the edge—to the rear of the building.

Q. How were they armed?

A. I did not see any arms except pistols.

Q. How did they bear their pistols?

A. Well, most of them had them strapped to their waists. They were fastened to a belt; just an ordinary belt around the waist.

Q. How many pistols did they carry?

Q. Some had one, and some two.

Q. Revolvers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know who was in command that day?

A. No, sir; I do not know who was in command.

Q. How many were there there at any time; what was the largest number who appeared there?

A. I do not think there were more than eight or nine hundred at the Newberry meeting.

Q. Was the republican meeting given up?

A. It was for that day. Another was ordered for the next week.

Q. Did you see any arms in the hands of the republicans who attended these meetings?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see them have any arms?

A. I did not see any; there may have been republicans who had arms, but there was none exhibited.

Q. At either of the meetings?

A. No, sir.

Q. You were not at any of the earlier meetings of the canvass, were you?

A. No, sir. I attended another meeting afterward at Newberry.

Q. You adjourned to another day; did you go at the day appointed?

A. Yes, sir; it was the following week, I think. At that meeting there was no demonstration made by the rifle clubs at all.

Q. They did not appear there?

A. No, sir; as United States commissioner, I had taken about one hundred and fifty or two hundred names of men who had been there.

Q. How large a meeting was it?

A. At this second-meeting, do you mean?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. Not near as large as the first one.

Q. About how large?
A. I should not think there was more than six or seven hundred.
Q. How many were there there the first day when the meeting was broken up?
A. Near twice as many, I should think.

STRAWBERRY.

It was also shown, and not in any manner contradicted, that at the first republican meeting held at Strawberry, in Charleston County, over a hundred mounted white democrats, armed with breech-loading rifles—seven-shooters—came to the meeting and occupied the front and left of the stand, sitting on their horses with their guns across the horses. At this meeting Mr. Jervey, Mr. Barker, and Mr. Rhett, democrats from Charleston, were speakers, and demanded half the time, which, under duress, was accorded to them. The republicans were without arms.

BRONSON AND LAWTONVILLE.

It was also shown that in the last week in September, or the first week in October, a republican meeting was held in Bronson, Beaufort County, at which Mr. Bampfield, General Smalls, Senator Green, and others were advertised as speakers. The meeting was about three o'clock p. m. The next day another meeting was held at Lawtonville, in the same county, at an earlier hour. Thomas E. Miller, a member of the Legislature, gave to us the following account of these two meetings:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. Where did you go?
Answer. We got off the cars right on the platform, and there was a large crowd of both races there, both white and colored.
Q. How many?
A. I should think the whites were between four and five hundred.
Q. How many colored men?
A. Between two and three hundred. As soon as we got on the ground a committee from the rifle clubs—the white rifle clubs—came to the republican speakers and demanded a part of the time.
Q. What did they say about it?
A. They say we hold no meeting there unless they have the right to alternate with us and close the meeting.
Q. Did they say anything other than that that you remember?
A. Well, during the conversation we refused at first. They said, "Well, unless you do that there will be no meeting." We acquiesced, and went from the depot to the place where we held the republican meetings generally. It was under a few trees. The meeting was organized and a motion was made that peace-officers be appointed, and eight from each political party be appointed. The meeting was organized by us electing a chairman, and the democrats immediately elected their chairman. The motion was made, as I stated, for peace-officers to be appointed, eight from each political party—sixteen; and upon the motion being put by the democratic chairman, (Mr. Hoover,) Hal Richardson, from Allandale, Barnwell County, who had command of the several Barnwell rifle clubs——
The CHAIRMAN. Did he have those clubs there with him?
A. Yes, sir; his rifle clubs was there. He rose and said: "Mr. Chairman, I object to any peace-officers being appointed, for, on behalf of the gentleman from Barnwell County, I state that we will hear speeches if they are not damn radical lies; but if the radical speakers intend to deliver their incendiary harangues, I will not vouch for the peace being kept by the gentlemen from Barnwell." And that statement being made, Mr. Hoover did not put the motion, and no officers were appointed. The meeting was organized. Nathaniel B. Myers was the first speaker on our side. As soon as Myers mounted the stand, some one from the crowd hallooed "Time," and Myers ceased to speak; and a white man, I did not know him, said, "These niggers have sticks, and we have left our rifles at the depot." As soon as the announcement was made, the chairman of our party requested the colored men to give their sticks up, and as soon as the command was given by our chairman, a democrat, who was sittting down in front of the box where we were speaking, threw up his revolver and said, "Damn them sticks: they ain't nothing. Here is plenty of pills that will take care of the mulatto sons of bitches;" and as he did that four or five other white men drew their pistols out and threw them down at their feet.
Q. Inside of the stand?
A. Right in front of the stand; not five feet from it.
Q. How many revolvers were thrown down there?
A. I saw five, sir.
Q. What did they say as they laid them down?
A. They said there was sufficient pills here to satisfy the mulatto sons of bitches. That was the expression of one man. One man spoke and drew his out, and as he drew his out three or four others did the same thing.
Q. Were they revolvers or single-shooters?
A. Revolvers, sir.
Q. What next occurred after that?
A. After that was done everything was quiet.
Q. You say that one republican had spoken and a man took the stand when this interruption took place?
A. Mr. Myers was on the stand when this interruption took place.
Q. A republican had spoken?
A. Mr. Myers was speaking; he was a republican; and while he was on the stand——
Q. He had not finished yet?
A. No, sir. While he was on the stand a party remarked that these niggers had their clubs there, and he stopped there; and while he stopped our chairman said the colored men should bring their clubs up. After Myers got through speaking, the next was a white man—I forget which democrat it was—and we alternated until we got through; but we were insulted from the time we commenced our meeting until we were through, by answers, "You are a liar," or "That is a damned lie."
Q. There were such expressions used?
A. O, yes, sir; very frequently.
Q. Who was speaking when such remarks were being made?
A. Such remarks were made when I was speaking, and such remarks were made when Mr. Bampfield was speaking.
Q. Do you remember any other expressions?
A. No, sir.
Q. What time did the meeting close?
A. The meeting closed about sunset. Orders was given by the several military companies, as we term them, and the men formed and went to the depot and got their guns.
Q. Did you hear the orders given to fall in?
A. O, yes, sir. I also heard, at the close of the meeting, when Hal Richardson, of Allendale, ordered the officers of two clubs to proceed over to Lawtonville the next day, two of the rifle clubs.
Q. When you reached there were these men at the depot?
A. They were at the depot.
Q. Had they their arms then?
A. They had their arms then.
Q. Where did they put their arms?
A. They left their arms, some of them, in the depot, and some of them in the stores, sir.
Q. Did you see that yourself?
A. O, yes, sir. I saw them putting their arms in the depot and in the stores.
Q. Where did they leave their horses?
A. The horses were hitched about to the different trees and posts in the neighborhood. Bronson is a place of a few houses, trees growing up indiscriminately, sir. They were mounted during the meeting.
Q. About how many white men were there armed that day?
A. Between four hundred and five hundred, sir.
Q. Were there any colored men acting with them?
A. There was one speaker that they had there, a colored speaker, by the name of Voss.
Q. In the military organization, I mean?
A. No, sir; I saw no colored men at all.
Q. Do you know where those white men were from?
A. The companies that Hal Richardson had under his charge, sir, were from Barnwell, some of them all the way from Blackville, forty-five or fifty miles from where the meeting was held.
Q. Was he the commander?
A. He spoke to me, sir, and told me he was commander-in-chief.
Q. Did he assume the command?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How far is Bronson from Allendale?
A. Allendale is on the same line of road, about fifteen miles from Bronson.
Q. That far from this meeting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In another county?
A. Yes, sir; Barnwell County.
Q. How is it as to the colored men being armed that day?
A. Some of the colored men had guns.
Q. How many?
A. I saw five guns.
Q. What kind of guns?
A. The ones I saw were the old plantation-muskets and shot-guns. I saw nary rifle on the ground. There was muskets and shot-guns.
Q. Have you stated all that occurred there that day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear anything said there about laborers?
A. Yes, sir. At that meeting you could hear the white men saying if the colored men did not vote the democratic ticket they would discharge them. I heard that. That was general and customary at all the meetings up there. It was the common talk and threats all over the county.
Q. This meeting at Lawtonville the next day, who was that called by?
A. By the republicans, sir; by our county chairman.
Q. Were you advertised to speak there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who else?
A. Mr. Myers, Mr. Bampfield, General Smalls, Senator Green, and others.
Q. It was called by the county chairman of Beaufort County?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What hour was that meeting called for?
A. That meeting was called for twelve o'clock.
Q. Did you go?
A. I went, sir.
Q. How far is Lawtonville from where you now live?
A. My permanent home, do you mean?
Q. Yes.
A. It is just three miles, sir, from my house. When that meeting was called, I was not living there then; I had left. When we got there, sir, we met a large crowd of both races there.
Q. How many of each?
A. Well, sir, I should think there was between three hundred and four hundred colored men there, and no more than three hundred white men at the outside, sir.
Q. Were the white men armed?
A. Yes, sir; they all came there armed. The two companies that came over from Bronson left their rifles in the school-house, about a quarter or a half mile from the place where the meeting was called. I saw them putting the guns in there myself, for we traveled the same road.
Q. Were they the same two companies that were at Bronson the day before?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And was Richardson with them?
A. Richardson was not with them.
Q. Who was in command of them?
A. I don't know. The party who did command them was a stranger to me, sir.
Q. How far was this school-house from the place of meeting?
A. Between a quarter and a half mile. It was in sight of the meeting, though, sir.
Q. Were they mounted or on foot?
A. Mounted, sir. The men that came over from Bronson were all mounted.
Q. Had they any other arms than their guns?
A. Yes, sir; every one of them had their revolvers in their belts, sir. You could see them just as plainly, sir, as if they had——
Q. Were they in sight?
A. Yes, sir; they were in sight.
Q. What occurred there?
A. Nothing, as far as it related to the Bronson meeting. At the Lawtonville meeting there was no intimidation there by words or by acts—the negroes were in the majority there, we outnumbered them—only as relates to myself.

The witness also stated that the same demand for a division of time was made at this meeting as at Bronson the day before. It was at first refused, but on the white people threatening to break up the meeting a division was allowed.

Several other witnesses were examined as to these meetings, confirming the evidence before stated, and there was no contradictory proof.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN COLONEL HASKELL AND GOVERNOR CHAMBERLAIN.

In confirmation of this, and to show the prominent events in the earlier part of the canvass, the undersigned proved and put in evidence the correspondence between Colonel Haskell, the chairman of the democratic State committee, and Governor Chamberlain, also given in evidence at Columbia, and printed in part 1, pages 349 to 368. The letter of Colonel Haskell bears date the 28th of September and Governor Chamberlain's answer the 4th of October. It was shown that this correspondence was published in the republican papers, and a pamphlet edition of a thousand copies was printed and circulated as a campaign document. In this it will be seen Governor Chamberlain gives a full review of the policy of his administration, as published in the Charleston News and Courier, the leading democratic paper in the State, which article closes as follows:

"Under the several heads the savings that have actually been made are:

In the bonanza bill	$400,000
In the executive contingent fund	101,260
In legislative expenses	350,810
In contingent expenses	355,000
In public printing	512,418
Total	1,719,488

"To realize this amount would require a tax of nearly 1½ per cent. Had the appropriations of the past two years been as inordinate as the average of the appropriations and expenditures of the preceding years, the State taxes of the past two years would have been ¾ per cent. a year more than the outrageous rate actually levied.

"This is the record of Governor Chamberlain, as shown by hard figures and unmistakable facts. We have strained or exaggerated nothing. The plain truth as we know it has been faithfully given. And we maintain that the record as it stands is one of which Governor Chamberlain has cause to be proud, that it justifies the support which has been given him, and is a complete answer to those of our friends who think that no act of Governor Chamberlain deserves public commendation but his refusal to issue the commissions to Whipper and Moses. This bold act, applauded everywhere in South Carolina, has not been mentioned in these articles." * * *

The governor also gives a detailed account of the riots for political purposes, notably those at Hamburgh, Ellenton, and Charleston; the violence resorted to at political meetings, especially those at Edgefield, Newberry, and Abbeville, to which reference has been made; the proscription of workingmen; of democratic bondsmen for republican officials, and the threatened refusal to rent houses or lands to any one who voted the republican ticket; of the democratic rifle clubs, and the various acts of violence which they had committed; and closes with the statement that the republican voters are not organized for successful resistance to the organizations he has described; that to call upon them to resist or suppress them would only invite or precipitate conflict, and that his reliance must be on the presence of United States troops.

Mr. Thompson testified that neither Mr. Haskell nor anyone else, to his knowledge, made any reply to the statements contained in the governor's letter.

INTIMIDATION.

In the light of these events it will not be difficult to arrive at a correct interpretation of the evidence before the subcommittee as to the conduct of the election in Charleston and Beaufort Counties. They are counties where the colored population largely exceeds the white, and each giving large republican majorities. Having the example set by whites of demonstrations of force and the policy of threats and intimidation for political effect, it would be strange indeed if they should not, upon provocation, imitate to some extent that example.

WHALEY'S CHURCH.

The first case inquired into by the subcommittee will afford an illustration. Mr. Hard, one of the managers at Whaley's precinct, Mr. Chors, the democratic supervisor, Mr. Smith, and Rev. Mr. Leadbetter, all white men, were examined.

They state that the colored voters came in clubs or groups, some had canes or clubs, and some had guns, but they were not exhibited until in the afternoon; four or five o'clock. Before that the guns were stacked seventy-five to a hundred yards from the polls. They state the republicans had a rallying committee and examined every man's vote; also, that after September it was a remark heard among colored men, "That a colored man who would vote the democratic ticket ought to be killed." This the witness who proved it said he did not regard as a threat, but a mode of expressing opposition to colored men voting that ticket.

There were 600 votes polled; only ten or twelve white voters, all democrats; and 18 democratic votes cast.

They state that there was one disturbance during the day, which Rev. A. P. Ford, republican candidate for the assembly, and for six years a member, helped to suppress. About five o'clock in the afternoon the colored men came up near the polls with their guns, sang "Hold the Fort for Hayes and Wheeler," and fired a salute. This was, as they admit, after the voting was nearly completed, and all the officers united in signing the returns without protest as to the fairness of the election.

ATTEMPTS AT BRIBERY.

The said Ford was then examined, and proved that on the Saturday night before the election, after he had retired, and between ten and eleven o'clock, the said Chors, the democratic supervisor, came to his house in Charleston City. The following account of the interview between himself and said Chors was given by said Ford:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. Have you a family?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. What does it consist of?
A. My family consists of four, sir; wife and two children.
Q. Did any one call on you the Saturday night before the election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who?
A. Mr. C. H. Chors.
Q. What does he do?
A. He is a planter, too, on Saint James Goose Creek. He called on me on a Saturday night, about the 5th of November.
Q. The Saturday night before the election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he hold any office on election day?
A. Yes, sir; he was the democratic United States supervisor.
Q. What time did he come to your house that Staturday night?
A. He came to my house between ten and eleven o'clock. I had gone to bed. That is in the city here.
Q. You were here then?
A. I was here in the city
Q. You have a house here?
A. Yes, sir; No. 13 Lion street.
Q. Did you see him?
A. I did, sir.
Q. Where did you see him?
A. On my piazza, sir. He came into the yard.
Q. Did you get up and dress?
A. I came down stairs after I heard he was there, dressed myself, and came out to see him.
Q. How long did he remain there?
A. He staid about half an hour, sir, talking with me.
Q. State what he said?
A. Well, sir, his conversation was this: He told me that he had a set of tickets that he wanted to get up in the interest of the democrats, and wanted me—knowing that I would carry that precinct—to destroy the republican ticket; that if I would use my influence in the interest of these tickets which he had I was to name the sum—whatever amount I would name he would go down Monday and have it deposited subject to my order, and I could just go there and get it.
Q. Did he describe what the ticket was?
A. The ticket was to head Wade Hampton as governor.
Q. And what electors?
A. Well, he was to put on all his men, and he would put on myself if I would use my influence for the ticket.
Q. Did he state who the electors would be?
A. Well, his electoral ticket would have been Tilden and Hendricks. I asked him over again, "Who did you say you were going to put on that ticket?" Then he said, "Hampton and Tilden and Hendricks and all the county officers," and of course he would put my name on the ticket. I told him right there and then that he mistake his man. I told him that I could not be a deceiver. And then he said to me, sir, that he thought it was a chance where I could make some money, and on that ground he thought he would give me an opportunity to do it. I told him life and liberty was more to me than all his money. He said to me, "Then if you do not propose to do it, between man and man not to make any mention of what transpired between me and him;" and I tell him, of course, I would not call his name. But I tell him I thought he would not approach a man like me to try to do a trick like that, when the people had confidence in me. I tell him that; and then that was the last conversation between him and me. I tell him good night. He tell me if I made up my mind to do it, I could see him at the Pavilion Hotel on Sunday. Of course I didn't see him until that Tuesday morning—the morning of the election. I did not see him from that Saturday night until the morning of the election.
Q. Who of your family saw him on that night beside yourself?
A. My mother-in-law and my wife. My mother-in-law came up-stairs and told me some one wanted to see me.
Q. How long have you known Mr. Chors?
A. Well, I have known him before the war and during the war.
Q. Did he mention any sum of money?
A. No, sir; he wanted me to state what I would do it for.
Q. Did he state where the money was?
A. He even told me that the executive committee—that I would not have to go to the executive committee, but all I was to do was to say what I would do it for, and he would have it done.
Q. Was anything of that kind ever said by him to you or you to him before that?
A. No, sir. That was the first time he ever approached me on that subject.
Q. He knew what your politics were?
A. O, he knew, sir; that is the reason he approached me.
Q. You have always been a republican?
A. Always, sir.
Q. Were you a slave?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When were you released from slavery; when the slaves were freed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You were released by the emancipation proclamation?
A. I was, sir.
Q. Had you any education at that time?
A. No, sir.
Q. What means have you had for getting an education since?
A. Well, sir, in the night-time, sir.
Q. You have acquired what knowledge you have by your own effort; you never attended any public school?
A. No, sir.

This evidence was not controverted. The witness Ford also gave a full account of the events at the polls on election day, a part of which is as follows:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. What time did you go to the election?
Answer. I got there about five o'clock in the morning.
Q. Did any one go with you?
A. Yes, sir; William Singleton and a young fellow by the name of Graves, who was acting as clerk at the poll that day.
Q. What position did Singleton hold?
A. Singleton was the republican supervisor.
Q. What time did you see Chors?
A. He came there about seven o'clock, or thereabouts.
Q. Did you have any conversation with him?
A. When he came he sent to call me, and I sent I hadn't time to see him.
Q. Did you have any conversation with him that day?
A. Well, sir, I had, about ten o'clock. There was a report made there that one Devoe was buying votes, and in that time there was some little excitement got up that this man was bribing the men by buying votes. This William Singleton he was supervisor, and he went, according to the statement that was made, to arrest Mr. Devoe; and after he was arrested Mr. Chors came to me and spoke to me in regard to it, that he didn't think Devoe was buying votes, and if I would not ask Singleton to let Devoe go.
Q. Mr. Chors said he didn't think Devoe was buying votes?
A. That is what Mr. Chors said. Then I told him that this man Singleton was an officer, and that I didn't like to interfere with it.
Q. Was anything more said?
A. In the course of about an hour or so Devoe went away in a buggy where he came from, and everything went on quietly after that.
Q. Had there been any disturbance that morning up to the time Devoe was arrested?
A. No, sir; not a word. They were more friends than anything else.
Q. How was the election conducted after Devoe went away?
A. I state on my honor that everything I seen went on quiet. I state that on my honor, sir; it was quiet, sir; it was quiet from that time until the polls were closed in the afternoon at six o'clock.
Q. Was there a person there about whom there was something said for voting the democratic ticket?
A. Away in the afternoon, about five o'clock—the polling-precinct is about one hundred yards from the State road—a young fellow was going off, and they said that he voted the democratic ticket, and he said he didn't care a damn about who liked it or not; and I seen the men going to talk, and I went to them myself, and I said, "It has been peaceable all day; don't let us have any fuss."
Q. What was this person's name?
A. Mitchell.
Q. He was boasting that he had voted the democratic ticket?
A. He was boasting, sir.
Q. Repeat what he said.
A. I heard him damning and cursing. His word was, "By God, he would vote as he damned please, and who in the hell can better it?" I heard that word.
Q. What did the men do?
A. Then I seen the men commenced to go toward him, and I went at once and said, "Now, we have had a quiet day; now, don't let us have any interruption at all." And every man stopped.
Q. Do you remember at about what time the poll closed?
A. Precisely at six o'clock. When it closed it was six o'clock by Mr. Hard's watch.
Q. Did he make the announcement?
A. Exactly; he did, sir.
Q. Was it yet dark?
A. Yes, sir; it was pretty dark. It was a clear day; I think it was a little darker than it is now.
Q. Getting dusk?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many votes were there polled there?
A. Six hundred.
Q. How many republican and how many democratic?
A. Five hundred and eighty-two republican votes and 18 democratic, sir.
Q. Did Mr. Chors say anything to you after the poll closed, or about the time it closed?
A. Yes, sir; after the poll was closed Mr. Chors came and took me by the hand, and he says——

By Mr. EDEN:

Q. Was this conversation after the polls had been closed?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. How soon after?
A. Right away after.
(Mr. PHILIPS objected to the admission of the testimony.)
The WITNESS. After the poll closed, Mr. Chors grasped my hand and said to me, "Ford, let me congratulate you on the manly way you conducted the poll this day. We could not have had a fairer election in the State."
Q. What did you do then?
A. I raised the tune, "Hold the fort."
Q. You proposed that?
A. Yes, sir; I was singing, "Hold the fort."
He also stated that after the song was finished, and as the men started for home, some of them fired off their guns, They had shot-guns and muskets, which they are accustomed to take in going to and from the election to shoot game in the woods. He said there was no use of the guns made during the day. There were no rifles there. He also testified that about nine o'clock he discovered a ticket like that mentioned by Chors Saturday night, and that six of them were voted that day. That Chors sent to him requesting an interview after he came to the polls, and he (Ford) refused to see him; but other white men requested him not to make a noise about that ticket, when he held up his ticket and said, "There is the republican ticket, and the other is bogus."
Another witness confirmed the statement of Ford as to the time of the singing and when the guns were fired.
It is of this precinct the majority say, in the first page of their report: "The conduct of the colored republican voters is indefensible, and on principle ought to vitiate the entire vote." They snuff intimidation afar off, but have no word of condemnation of the admitted infamy of a democratic official (Chors) to procure by BRIBERY and FRAUD the whole vote of the precinct for the candidates of his party, with one or two exceptions. The fact that the ballots were scrutinized and required to be shown, to prevent the consummation of the attempted fraud when discovered on the day of election, is dwelt upon as a violation of the election law and of the sacred right to vote "a concealed ballot." The undersigned can see in the facts thus narrated abundant cause for all the watchfulness and excitement proven, and in answer to all complaints of the majority about this first chapter of intimidation and wrong will employ the language of the guilty author of all the disturbance:
"After the polls closed, Mr. Chors came and took me by the hand and said, 'Ford, let me congratulate you on the manly way you conducted the poll this day. We could not have had a fairer election in the State.' "

BIGONS CHURCH.

The next precinct about which evidence was given was Bigons Church. It was shown that the whites, about twenty-five in number, went armed with rifles, and stacked their guns a part of the time in the room back of the polls and part of the time had them in their hands. There were only five or six white persons in Bigons Church precinct; the rest were sent there by "influential men," as one of the witnesses stated, because the "negroes would intimidate democratic negroes, and they wanted as many whites as possible." The first white peace-maker thus commissioned and the first witness examined stated that he went with a rifle and a pistol. Others who went were armed in the same way. A part of the colored men had guns, and the rest common walking-sticks, which the colored people always carry. The colored men left their guns a hundred and fifty yards from the polls, and came up separately and singly to vote.
No violence was used; no threats made that day; no complaint made of the fairness of the election; all the officers signed the returns. Among the witnesses called was Tony Scott, of this precinct, who confessed that he attended a meeting at Strawberry, where he was announced as one of the republican speakers, and consented to act as such, but intended all the time to make a democratic speech, and did attempt to do so, but the republicans compelled him to leave the stand, and he was "afraid after that."

STRAWBERRY FERRY.

At Strawberry Ferry, another precinct, both white and colored voters had guns, the latter the greater number, as their numbers were treble those of the whites. "Nobody was hurt;" the managers all signed the returns, agreed as to the count, but the white men made a protest "that the clerk was not sworn; that the polls were not opened at the usual hour; that democrats were prevented from voting the democratic ticket," and other grounds not remembered. Mr. Colcock, president of the democratic club, drew up the protest. All who came to the polls voted. All the challenges made were sustained but two, in which persons challenged as minors swore they were of age.
The remaining evidence as to other precincts in Charleston County, and as to the events at a Hampton meeting in Charleston City, is not of sufficient importance as affecting the canvass to deserve extended comment or consideration.

HILTON HEAD.

Evidence was given as to a disturbance which occurred at Mitchelville precinct, on Hilton Head Island.
It was proven that of sixteen white voters ten were democrats and six republicans. There were four hundred and fifty-odd colored republican votes. A white man named McFall, who worked land on the island, had been a slave-holder, and claimed to be on good terms with the colored people and their professed friend, was engaged in peddling ballots among the voters. About ten o'clock a disturbance arose. McFall complained to Mr. Drayton, one of the managers, that the colored people had ordered him from the polls, and he appealed for protection. Drayton read the United States law, but the colored men became more violent. They drove McFall from the polls. The colored people were not armed. McFall stated they took all his tickets away from him and told him if he would leave the ground and not come back till after six o'clock, they would not kill him; that he agreed to go, but before starting he said "he would come back after six and give three cheers for Tilden and Hampton, our next rulers." Upon these statements it would appear that the treatment of McFall was without provocation. It was proven, however, later in the investigation, by evidence uncontradicted, that McFall had attempted to circulate a fraudulent democratic ticket, in imitation of the republican ticket in both the heading and color of the ink, and, being detected in it, was driven from the polls as above stated. Complaints were open and vehement about his conduct. McFall admitted to Dr. Wilder that day that he had circulated the tickets, but denied that he represented them as republican tickets. The ticket was as follows:

No other disturbance took place at this poll, except a sailor by the name of Lightburn offered his vote, at which there was excitement; but he refused to swear in his vote, being challenged, and the election was quiet the rest of the day. All the managers signed the returns without protest or complaint.

GRAY'S HILL.

At Gray's Hill precinct a similar attempt at imposition was made by Mr. Porteus, the democratic supervisor. He and Mr. Van Ness, the democratic manager, went there together from Beaufort. There were four hundred and seventy-six colored voters. Van Ness handed a package of tickets to Porteus, who, as he states, put them on the window where the voters could see them and said, "Here, men, are the tickets for you to vote." After a while Porteus went out among the voters, and one of them asked him what he meant by bringing out those democratic votes. Porteus said he came with the man who brought them. They drove him into the room where the ballot-boxes were, told him that was his place, and threatened him if he came out again. Before he reached the room they snatched from him his instructions, which he attempted to read. It was proven that the tickets Porteus thus attempted to put in circulation and palm off upon the uneducated colored voters were the same kind circulated by McFall at Hilton Head, and above given, and the excitement arose from the discovery of that attempt. Porteus was compelled to admit that he voted the same ticket himself, and Van Ness says the managers signed the returns without protest. Porteus tried to get a colored man, his former slave, to electioneer for the red ticket he was trying to circulate, of which a witness named Hayward gives the following account:

Question. What was he doing?
Answer. He was around the poll electioneering.
Q. Did he have any ballots?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What occurred there? If there was any disturbance about his ballots, state what it was.
A. There was no disturbment at all, sir.
Q. Was there anything said about the ballots he was circulating?
A. Yes, sir; he called to me and asked me to go and electioneer for the Hampton ticket.
Q. Mr. Porteus requested you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you tell him?
A. I told him I could not do it.
Q. What further did he say?
A. About the time that I and him commenced talking, we was talking to ourselves privately, and then all the boys begin to come around him and asked him to pay them what he owe them for chopping wood for him; and I told him then—he used to be my old boss, and I didn't want to get into no fuss—I told him his business was in the house, and he had better go back in the house, and he went as far as the door; and he called me again and hand me a bunch of tickets, and asked me to go around and electioneer again, and I told him I couldn't. He told me if I would electioneer the Hampton ticket that I would be a man if Hampton get in power.
Q. What did you say to that?
A. I told him that if I had to be a man by electioneering for General Hampton, that I didn't think I would. Then he asked me why I would be so foolish, and my reply to him be, that if I had my hand in the rattlesnake's mouth, and somebody would be good enough to open his mouth and let me get my hand out, I don't think I would be fool enough to put it in again; and then Mr. Porteus went in again in the house.
Q. What became of the ballots he gave you?
A. I didn't take them out of his hand at all.
Q. What further occurred?
A. After that he came out again and tried to electioneer again, and found he could not do any good, and he didn't say any more about it.

Q. Where did he go to then?
A. He went back in the house again, sir.

This witness also testified that he had been manager and supervisor at every election which had been held at that precinct, and it was as fair an election as they ever had. Porteus said he was perfectly satisfied with the election at the time and of the quietness observed. Some of the fraudulent tickets were found in the ballot-box.

ATTEMPTS AT FRAUD.

It was proved that the same kind of ticket was attempted to be put in circulation in other parts of Beaufort County; but by the timely vigilance of General Smalls, who made the discovery at Beaufort, the success of the attempt was prevented. It thus appears that at the various precincts where the claim of the greatest violence is made deliberate efforts to bribe and cheat the electors and managers were made. To a people conscious of their want of education and smarting under the charge of their alleged inferiority, such attempts cause more intense feeling and excitement than with electors differently surrounded. They explain all the worse features of the evidence taken. That such persons should be jealous of their rights and indignant at such attempts to violate them is natural.

The evidence fails to disclose the fact that any material change in the vote was the result. Evidence was also given of a violent personal assault by a colored barber named Barnes, alias Polite, residing at Beaufort, upon one Jenkins, another colored man. Only the account of the affair given by Jenkins was heard; but it appeared that the trial justice before whom complaint was made turned the matter over to a United States commissioner, by whom the barber was held to bail as for a political offense, and that the grand inquest at the district court at Charleston dismissed the case and presented no bill, thus demonstrating it was not a political offense, as charged and sought to be proved.

It was also shown that one Peter Jones, who had been in some manner involved by his refusal to join in a laborers' strike in July last, and who was punished for not acting with the strikers, was interfered with on election day at Gardner's Corner, or near there. His horse was taken and left with a person in the neighborhood—a friend of Jones—but he stated he voted the democratic ticket. He was foreman, and had $20 per month, while laborers only had twelve, and the feeling against him did not appear to partake of a political character. He states electors, from fear, did not vote that day, but did not give names or particulars.

LAWTONVILLE AND LAWTON CHURCH.

Evidence somewhat conflicting was given as to the occurrences at Lawtonville and Lawton Church election day, but the returns were signed by all the managers, and without protest.

There was an after-election occurrence, as stated in the report of the majority, an assault on one Peter Johnson, an attempt to resist the officers in arresting the perpetrators, and all parties concerned are now under arrest. The affair, much as it is to be regretted, does not seem to have any special connection with the canvass.

THOMAS E. MILLER.

The report of the majority as to the circumstances under which Mr. Thomas E. Miller was compelled to leave his home is not, in the judgment of the undersigned, a fair representation of the case. I prefer to let Mr. Miller, whose statement I believe to be the truth, speak for himself, rather than to use language of my own.

After stating he was a resident of Lawtonville up to July last; that he is a native of the State; that he was educated at Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, and admitted to practice law in 1874 by the present judges of the supreme court; that he is a republican, and was called to defend a man by the name of Mix—a colored man—on a charge of malicious trespass on the property of one Nathaniel Ellis, he gave the following account of the trial and subsequent events:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. Was he a democrat?
A. O, yes, sir. And for his being a money-lender he owns pretty near every poor white man in that section of the country financially. Upon the day of trial he had from twenty to forty white men summoned there, because he knew he had no case at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Confine yourself to statement of facts.

The WITNESS. He had from thirty to forty white men summoned upon the day of trial, armed with revolvers, and some of them with shot-guns. When I got up to address the trial justice, for I would not have a jury, I denounced the procedure as a malignant persecution.

Q. You claimed that as counsel?
A. Yes, sir, as counsel; and I used the word that it was conceived in fraud, and that I would so prove it before I was through. That is the height of the language I used against the Ellis family. The old man sprung to his feet, with knife in hand, in court, and demanded that I should retract. I modified my statement, and his son, an ex-trial justice, whom I had removed for his damnable procedure against the negroes in that section of the country—there is where the political spite comes in—appeared as attorney for his father. He accepted my modification. The old man was kept in his seat by his son, Madicus Ellis, who is now in town here. As soon as a decision was given in favor of my client, I walked out of court, mounted my horse, and started away from the crowd. As I mounted about fifteen white men mounted also, but remained where they had mounted in their saddles. As soon as I got into the road, so I could see before me, I saw five young white men on foot, with clubs in their hands and revolvers in their belts. As I approached them, Jeff Ellis, the son of old Nat Ellis, said to me, "You mulatto son of a bitch, you, stop!" And as he said that, young John Joe Schueman, jr., who has been killed since in a riot, caught my horse by the rein, and as he caught it, Ellis dealt me a blow along here [indicating] with a spoke out of a Jersey wagon, which felled me from the saddle; and as I fell to the ground—my senses had not yet left me—Ellis repeated the blow. I was picked up, I suppose, for I did not know who did it, by the men, and carried to the trial justice's house, for when my senses returned I was in his piazza, and was bleeding. Old man Ellis, as soon as I arose upon my feet, said, "It will cost as much for a half-dead nigger as a whole one. Let us kill the nigger son of a bitch, for this is a white man's country, and no damn nigger lawyer shall remain here." As soon as he said that, an elderly white man, by the name of Bill Cuyler Johnston, threw himself in the small gate that led into the flower-garden, and which would give them access to where I was, and said, "For God's sake, men, let us not have another Hamburgh affair." Ellis said, "Move, Bill, and let us kill the nigger." Mr. Johnston said, "No, I will not, for the eyes of the nation are now on us; let us act as men." After much persuasion he got the men to retire from the smaller gate out to the large gate into the road. He then came into the piazza and said to me, "Miller, I knew you and all your parents, both white and black, from the days of boyhood," and he said, "Won't you go home and let these Ellises alone?" I told him I would not make any such promise; that I would sue them. Then he said, "Miller, you are excited now, and mad. Won't you defer this matter until Thursday of next week?" That was on Saturday. I told him, "Mr. Johnston, there is no delay with me; I mean what I say." "Well," he says, "you will not go home if you mean it. These men will not allow you to go home alive unless you promise to defer the matter." Then after he told me that I would not be allowed to go home alive unless I postponed the matter and to give him an answer on Thursday, I made him a promise that I would wait until Thursday. Upon Thursday morning, the day promised by me to give an answer, about sixty men, armed with revolvers and shot-guns and pistols, assembled before my door and stacked their guns against a log that lay parallel with my fence. About nine o'clock Mr. Johnston came. They awaited Mr. Johnston's arrival—Bill Cuyler Johnston. He came in a buggy with young Jeff Ellis, the man that dealt the blow upon the Saturday before. I admitted him into my house, and refused to let any other white man come through the gate, but kept the crowd back, and he came in. After a conference of about one hour, I concluded, for my safety as a republican, that I would have to leave that country, and I left and went down to Grahamville, from information coming from democrats themselves, and not from republicans.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you propose to prove?

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer to show the advice that Johnston gave the witness in this interview as an inducement for him to go away.

(Offer overruled.)

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. Who is Mr. Johnston?
A. He is a large farmer, sir; an ex-slaveholder, and a South Carolinian.
Q. Is he a democrat also?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. A friend of the Ellises?
A. A friend of the Ellises; they were boys together.

This witness further stated that he had been active in politics as a republican since 1872; had often addressed political meetings in Beaufort County; that he was elected to the Legislature in 1874, and again at the last election; and that he had procured the removal of a son of Mr. Ellis in 1864 from the office of trial justice, and the criticisms upon his evidence in the majority report are, in the opinion of the undersigned, unwarranted by the testimony taken.

DANGER OF NEGRO RULE.

The slur upon him and his race, as "unfit and incompetent for such an important trust" as that of managers and officers of election; that they are accustomed to act "without propriety and heedless of responsibility," which is contained in the report of the majority, is also unwarranted by the evidence.

They are quite as safely to be trusted with an honest and fair franchise as white men who first try to scare and then endeavor to bribe and cheat them by reason of their supposed weakness and imputed ignorance. It is not the ignorant colored men who are looked upon in the State as objects of danger, but rather the educated and intelligent, who are able to defend themselves and to expose all attempts to coerce, cheat, defraud, or purchase them.

Mr. Hurd, who was captured with the electoral returns in Abbeville County by armed white men and carried into Georgia, his life threatened, and finally released on his promise never to return to the State, gives the real feeling of the white South Carolinians about "smart colored men" in the following incident in his testimony:

"About dark Stark and Bradley and a man named Kelley—they had gone back to the house and they came up to me with a pistol at this time, and he said, 'Well, Hurd, it's night now and darkness hides all crimes.' I begged them not to kill me, and I said, 'I am willing for anything if you just don't kill me.' Says he, 'O, by God! it's no use; that is what we have been waiting for;' and they asked which I would rather, be hung or shot. I told him I had never been killed, and I didn't know which, but I hoped they would not kill me at all. I told them I was not ready to die. They asked me if I could get ready in fifteen minutes. I told them I didn't think I could. This man Kelley had his shot-gun, and he told them to let him shoot me, that he would do it, no matter what I said. Stark said my life was in his hands, and, says he, 'You know, Hurd, that I hate you as I do the devil; you are just as if you were hanging over hell.' Says he, 'I would rather kill you than twenty common niggers, because you have some sense, and you would do more harm than twenty common niggers.'"

It would seem as though a bright, educated, intelligent man as Mr. Miller appeared to be, of whom Johnson said, (as Miller himself stated it,) "I knew you and all your parents, both white and black, from the days of boyhood," might escape the ostracism of South Carolinians and the censure and criticism of a congressional committee; but he "has some sense, and can do more harm" to South Carolina democrats "than twenty common niggers," and hence his selection as the object of reproach in the report of the majority.

Considerable evidence was taken tending to show that colored voters gave assurances to their employers before the election that they would vote the Hampton ticket, and it was also testified to by one witness that a number of colored men went to Charleston to attend a Hampton meeting and from fear staid away from the place of meeting. The negroes feared they would be discharged on one hand, and the reproaches of their race for political infidelity on the other, added to which their natural inclination to vote the republican ticket, if left free to act, doubtless induced them to some extent to dissemble as to their real purposes and to resort to excuses for a seeming violation of assurances given in voting the republican ticket. Such are by no means uncommon occurrences in the States where electors claim more independence and intelligence and are left free to exercise their choice.

The undersigned has answered the report of the majority as to the claim boastingly made in the report of the majority that there was no violence by democrats on election day in Charleston and Beaufort Counties. The few whites were armed, and carried in many instances their arms to the polls, but, finding the colored people prepared to meet them and greatly outnumbering them at each precinct, wisely concluded that "discretion was the better part of valor," and resorted to the peaceable remedies of attempts at bribery and cheating in the form and color of the ballots.

The pacific purposes of the white democrats is illustrated by the fact, proved without controversy, that on Monday of the same week the committee reached Columbia several thousand of the white rifle clubs, armed with rifles, assembled in Columbia. No other object can be imagined than the forcible inauguration of Hampton for governor. It was published about that time that Hampton said "he held the life of Governor Chamberlain in his hands." On Tuesday evening these men were addressed by Hampton in the street, to whom he said, "Gentlemen, I do not know what you are here for; you have come to attend the fair; but, if so, you come one day too soon." The next evening they were addressed, at the same place, by Mr. Moise, a candidate on the democratic ticket, who said, "Gentlemen, I want you all to go home. The congressional committee are coming here to-morrow, and we want to see no demonstrations of such crowds while they are here."

Had the law been enforced, it is claimed by the majority, "Charleston and Beaufort Counties would have destroyed the majority in the State for Hayes and Wheeler."

CHARLESTON COUNTY.

The vote in Charleston in 1870 was 13,411 for the republican candidate and 6,980 for the democratic, giving a republican majority of 6,431, and a total of 20,391. In 1876, the vote was 14,952 for the republican ticket and 8,653 for the democratic ticket, giving a republican majority of 6,199, and a total of 23,605. While the vote was increased over that of 1870 over three thousand, the republican majority was not a large as in 1870. By the census of 1875, the voting population of the county was, whites, 7,398, and colored, 17,787; total, 25,085. This exceeds the actual vote by 1,480. The republican vote was nearly three thousand less than the colored voters, and the democratic vote over 1,300 more than the white voters.

BEAUFORT COUNTY.

In Beaufort County, the republican vote in 1870 was 4,125, and the democratic vote 1,016, giving a republican majority of 5,109, and a total vote of 7,141.

In 1876 the republican vote was 7,570, and the democratic vote 2,250, giving a republican majority of 5,320, and a total of 9,820. Although the vote was over twenty-five hundred greater than in 1870, the republican majority is nearly the same. By the census of 1875, the voting population of the county was, whites 1,760, and colored 8,241; total, 10,001. This exceeds the actual vote by over a hundred. The republican vote is over six hundred less than the colored voters, and the democratic vote is five hundred greater than the number of the entire white voters of the county.

EDGEFIELD COUNTY.

In Edgefield County, where the violence of the campaign is proven as above stated, a similar comparison shows the following results:

In 1870 the republican vote was 4,547, and the democratic vote 3,704, giving a republican majority of 843, and a total of 8,251.

In 1876 the republican vote was 3,123, and the democratic vote 6,257, giving a democratic majority of 3,134, and a total of 9,380.

By the census of 1875 the voting population was 2,722 whites and 4,400 colored, making a total of 7,122.

The vote of 1876 exceeded the entire voting population by 2,258. While the republican vote was 1,267 less than the colored voters, the democratic vote was 3,535 more than the white voters. The whole excess is in the democratic vote.

A similar comparison would show like results in other counties, and conclusively establish the frauds practiced by the democrats in the election.

CONCLUSION.

The undersigned can find no reason to doubt that if the canvass in the State had been free from violence and fraud the republican majority would have been sufficiently large to elect all the candidates for State officers and to have largely increased the majority for the Hayes and Wheeler electors, as shown by the face of the returns.

E. G. LAPHAM.

The committee appointed by the House of Representatives to inquire into and report upon the condition of political affairs in South Carolina, having held its first sessions in the city of Columbia for the investigation of facts connected with the appointment of presidential electors, was divided into three subcommittees, of which two were directed to proceed to the city and county of Charleston, and to investigate and report upon the political condition of the seaboard counties. The undersigned, a member of one of these committees, of which Hon. A. G. COCHRANE was chairman, presents the following observations upon the subjects brought before that committee, with his reasons for dissenting from some of the conclusions of the majority of its members.

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON.

From the foundation of the Republic, as well as during the earlier period of colonial history, Charleston was an important social, financial, and political center of the Southern States. It was for a long period one of the most important cities of North America. The founders of its industries developed the capacities of soil and climate, and enlarged the agricultural products of the country by the addition of staples that held out to them for a time a flattering prospect for the control of the industrial pursuits of all civilized nations. Its commerce extended to every sea. It was a center of art and fashion. The first artists of Europe and America were proud of its approval and grateful for its patronage.

Josiah Quincy, jr., of Boston, said, in his journal of a visit in 1773, that in grandeur, splendor of buildings, decorations, equipages, shipping, and commerce, it surpassed all he had seen or ever expected to see in America. And a nobleman of France said, a few years later, (1796,) of its society, that whatever might be said of European gentility, in no part of the globe was hospitality so much practiced as in America, and nowhere with more refinement, sincerity, and grace than in Charleston, South Carolina.

Its churches were unsurpassed in utility and elegance by any public buildings of that day, and now, after the lapse of a century and a half, they are not inferior to the best architectural structures of the present time. Its public journals, in their day, were counted among the most enlightened and influential organs of opinion. Its advocates stood at the head of the legal profession of the country. Its orators and statesmen exerted a powerful influence upon the Government, and for a considerable period may be said to have been its masters. Indifferent to office themselves they were able to bring aspirants for political favor to their feet, and to destroy those who had the courage to resist their demands, just as a seal hunter, by a tap on the nose, disables his game in the waters of Alaska. Only one man—the greatest of the earlier presidents except the first—was recognized by them as superior or even an equal in political power, and he was a native of South Carolina.

The city did not present to the committee of the House of Representatives the brilliant aspect which has been ascribed to its earlier history. Its glory had departed, and the mourners went in silence about the streets. Despondency rested upon the faces of men, and grief for what had passed was suppressed by apprehension of the future. When a man reaches the summit of a hill, his immediate danger is a descent on the other side. A surfeit of the necessaries of life is often the immediate cause of sudden death. The people of South Carolina suffered from excess of prosperity and happiness, and the continual submission of those who sought their favor to their constantly increasing demands, tempted them to heights from which they were sure to fall. Such an extraordinary and sudden change necessarily became a subject of contemplation for every thoughtful visitor. That which the committee saw in 1876 was the natural effect of this transformation, and what it heard were the muffled chimes that mark the inevitable change which occurs in a life attended in its course with nothing but songs of joy. An investigation and explanation of the causes of this change would be too much to expect of an average committee of the House of Representatives. The proper consideration of these important events that led to the prostration of a State once so powerful and prosperous, opens an almost limitless field for conscientious speculation and inquiry. It presents a subject of investigation upon which the best interests of the country and the possibility of a republican form of government may ultimately depend. The resolution of the House may have contemplated, if it did not direct, an inquiry of this extended character; but neither the time nor the occasion for the performance of such a duty was within the reach of the committee. The widest scope open to its members was the consideration of the actual, honest, and legal results of the appointment of presidential electors, and the character and integrity of the incidents that attended such an exciting contest in the much-disturbed State of South Carolina.

During the late presidential election political excitement ran high, especially in that part of South Carolina bordering upon the sea, or what is usually denominated the lower tier of counties, as distinguished from the central and upper, or mountainous portions of the State. The public disturbances consequent upon the violent conflict of politics and passions attracted the attention of the whole country. Among the most striking and prominent of these events, which affected the political character of the State, and indirectly that of the country, were—

I. The riot in King street, of the city of Charleston, the 6th of September, 1876.

II. The Cainhoy riot the 16th of October.

III. The riot in Broad street the 8th of November, the day following the presidential election.

These incidents in the history of the city and county are not only indications of the temper of the times and the character of the people, but they must be considered as having, in a material degree, affected the measures and policy adopted by all parties in the management of political affairs.

To these subjects, and an infinite number of minor and subsidiary topics incident to the excited condition of the public mind and the importance of the contest, the committee gave such attention as the limited time allowed for the investigation permitted. The occasion was not propitious for judicial investigation. The events were so recent and party passion ran so high that it was impossible to obtain and unreasonable to expect a perfectly calm, dispassionate, or truthful relation of the history of these social and political convulsions in which the witnesses must necessarily have been prominent and responsible actors.

Up to the late presidential election there had been, for a long period, a very general fusion of parties and opinions in political affairs. For eight years there had been, it is said, no strict division of parties in the State of South Carolina.

In 1870, it is stated, the democrats voted largely for the Union reform candidate for governor, who was a republican. The present mayor of the city, Mr. George I. Cunningham, a native of Tennessee, and a citizen of South Carolina for nearly thirty years, was elected in 1873 by the co-operation of prominent men of all political parties, and re-elected in 1875 by a similar movement of men of different views, strengthened by the public satisfaction with which his administration had been regarded. Governor Chamberlain, the chief executive officer of the State, who had assumed a political position somewhat independent of existing organizations and endeavored to reform the abuses and correct the errors of the administration that then existed, had received unreserved and liberal commendation of many of the leaders and journals of both parties, and was supported and indorsed in those efforts by the conservative and democratic as well as the republican organs of the State. This manifestation of public favor had reached such a point as to lead to a demand for his renomination to the office of governor by the conservative and democratic convention which was to be held at Columbia in October, 1876. To the action of that convention is to be traced, in a great degree, the present condition of political affairs in that city and the State and the convulsions which attended the late election. Instead of being the leader of the South, as before, South Carolina had become a follower of other States. Mississippi and Georgia, especially, exerted a powerful and controlling influence over her political policy, and those States may be said to have produced the change which occurred in the constitution of parties and the course of political events during the last year.

THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION—A SECRET SESSION.

Vigorous and determined efforts were made by the most influential men of the State to organize the government upon a democratic basis and in support of the nominations of the democratic national convention at Saint Louis. The convention for nomination of governor, held at Columbia, was used, not altogether with the concurrence of the people of the State, for that purpose. This convention, unlike other political organizations of this character, transacted its important business in secret session. The evidence printed on page 141 of the second part of the testimony taken by the committee shows that immediately after its organization reporters of the public journals and all other persons not recognized as members of the convention were excluded and the convention transacted its business in secret with closed doors. When the doors of the convention were opened the nomination of governor was made in public. It was little more than a formal recognition of the policy recognized and approved in secret session. No report of the proceedings of this secret session has been made public; but it was in that session, doubtless, that the course to be pursued in the presidential contest, the means to be used, the machinery to be applied to the work in hand, and the probable chances of success were proposed, supported by argument, and finally agreed upon. It was made a straight-out democratic convention. The two candidates before the convention were Governor Chamberlain and General Wade Hampton. By a strict party vote the new and revolutionary policy prevailed.

The straight-outs carried the convention by a meager majority of 5 votes, and Hampton was nominated. Governor Chamberlain was subsequently nominated by the republicans as their candidate for the same office. Complete electoral tickets of the republican and democratic parties for President and Vice-President were placed before the people. It is to the policy established by this Bourbon democratic convention, in contravention of the wishes of a large portion of those acting with the democratic party and an overwhelming majority of the people, that are to be traced the turbulence, convulsion, riot, and murder which occurred during that sanguinary campaign, alike destructive of the best interests of the State and discreditable to republican government. The contest thus forced upon the people of South Carolina compelled a re-organization of political parties and forces on this new partisan basis. The success of the democrats made it necessary for them to change by violent measures, the constituent elements of political power in the city and county of Charleston, as in other parts of that State. In no other way and by no other method could the coveted political triumph be won. In such a contest the true interests and honor of the city and the honest opinions of large portions of the people of the State and of the Union were of course disregarded, and no efforts were spared to secure an unalloyed, unreserved party triumph.

No other secret convention for the nomination of State tickets or presidential electors was held during the centennial year within the territory or in connection with the Government of the United States. What policy was to be advocated, into what questionable practices were the people to be initiated, and what new machinery was to be introduced that made a secret conclave of partisan leaders necessary in South Carolina? What was there in the principles and policy of the new democracy of that State that could not be promulgated with the freedom that distinguished every other democratic convention held within the limits of the Union? Why were the democratic reporters of the democratic press of the State and Union excluded? Was it because new principles were to be proclaimed or new methods of canvassing devised and imparted, or were the interpreters and instructors of the new tactics too little known and too strongly identified with other States to be acceptable to the people of South Carolina?

THE RIFLE CLUBS.

One of the results of the policy initiated in that secret convention was the organization of rifle clubs, or professed social clubs in other forms, whose object was to influence, in various ways, individual and public opinion, and control the State and presidential canvass by means which had been successfully practiced in other States. The strength and character of these clubs in the city and county of Charleston are clearly set forth in the testimony of Hon. George I. Cunningham, mayor of the city. (Pages 184 to 195.)

In the city of Charleston several of the rifle clubs were a revival of pre-existing military organizations chartered before the war. Some were organized in 1869, when the city was in a disturbed condition and the police insufficient for the preservation of order, and others were formed during the campaign. There were twenty-seven in number.

The leaders of the movement asserted that the colored people were anxious for reform in county and state administration, if not in the administration of the General Government. There were a few prominent colored men of position and influence who had generally voted with the conservative or democratic party, and who had at first met with some harshness on this account from their own race. But this annoyance had ceased, and a large number of colored republicans, it was claimed, were ready to enroll themselves in the democratic clubs, but they demanded personal protection, and these clubs were created for that purpose. The proclamation of Governor Chamberlain, October 7, and that of the President, October 17, ordering them to disband, and treating all who publicly bore arms as violators of the law, was the first public act that militated against the success of the democratic experiment in "getting" the colored vote.

The white people, as they believed, had begun to gain the ear and win the confidence of the colored people. There were but two active agents at work against them—an apprehension on the part of the negroes that if the democrats came into power they would enact laws more intolerable than slavery, and the influence exerted by the churches and the women. It was necessary to counteract these and other agents by some direct and powerful agency, and the system of the rifle clubs was universally and joyfully accepted and used as a legitimate and proper means to accomplish the object constantly kept in view.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CITY.

George I. Cunningham, the present mayor of the city, is a native of Monroe County, Tennessee, and has resided in Charleston twenty-three years. He has held that office since 1873, and is now serving his second term. He received the republican nomination at the late election, but was in fact chosen by democrats, having received their support on account of the good order that had been maintained in the city during the first two years of his service as mayor. The News and Courier and the leading citizens of Charleston supported him at the election in 1875.

During the late presidential canvass an editorial was published in the News and Courier in which it was declared that "the rifle clubs were the only effective custodians of the public peace in Charleston." It was, in other words, a proclamation that the clubs had assumed and were considered to be the only efficient government of the city.

This publication was made on the 9th October. The next day the mayor published a card denying the statement, and making an official report of the condition of the city. No complaint had been made of the inefficiency of the government or of the disturbance of public peace until the commencement of the political campaign of 1876, and no trouble had occurred of any kind to affect the peace of the city or alarm its citizens until the meeting called on the 25th August to ratify the nomination of Tilden, Hendricks, and Hampton. It was announced in the morning papers of that day that the commanding officer of the rifle clubs had detailed a sufficient number of mounted men to patrol every part of the city to keep order during the night, and that during the continuance of the procession and the meeting every portion of the city would be thoroughly patrolled by mounted men, to protect the remote parts of the town from the depredations of thieves and vagabonds, and to enable people of all classes to take part in the political demonstration. The next morning it was stated that the good order of the city on the night of the 25th was in consequence of the detail of men from the rifle-clubs. This patrol and the speeches made on Citadel Green by General Ferguson and others were unprecedented events in that city, and created much excitement. Until then no material disturbance of the peace had occurred.

That meeting was really the commencement of trouble. The rifle clubs had not interfered with public affairs until the democratic meetings were called to support nominations. On the assumption that there was likely to be a riot, they marched through the city and made a great deal of trouble, by threats and otherwise. If they had kept off the streets, to use the language of his honor the mayor, from whose testimony this view of the condition of the city is substantially taken, there would have been no trouble at all. They continued to patrol the streets in that way up to the period of the President's proclamation. The riot of the 6th September, the first serious disturbance of the public peace, was the result of those proceedings. The mayor had called the attention of the leading men of the democratic party to the unnecessary excitement that had been occasioned by these unauthorized movements of military organizations and to the consequences which were likely to ensue. They were, in fact, in possession of the city, and in a condition successfully to resist the civil authorities.

General Conner told the mayor that if there was any disturbance in the city they, the democrats, would put it down; they intended to protect themselves, and, if collision was to come, the sooner it came the better it would be; that he thought it could not be long kept off, and the sooner it occurred the better. They assumed this authority not only without any invitation on the part of the mayor, but against his wishes and orders; and, but for this intervention of these political clubs, the mayor, in his testimony, (pp. 184 to 195,) states positively there would have been no trouble, and no violence would have occurred in the city. The colored people in Charleston were absolutely under control. There was no danger of any outbreak from any quarter, and the only peril that existed was from the action of the rifle clubs. He notified their officers that the police force was large enough to keep order if it was not for the presence of the rifle clubs. The assumption that the people could not be controlled without the presence of the rifle clubs was without any foundation in fact, and their co-operation in keeping the public peace was wholly unnecessary.

Up to the 6th September there had been no discrimination on the part of the government as to the political character of public meetings. Whenever notice of a meeting was received by the mayor a guard was sent for its protection. A sufficient force of policemen was immediately sent to keep the peace, and no trouble occurred. As to the meeting the 6th of September, he says that the city authorities were not notified and had no knowledge of the meeting. If it had been known there would have been a sufficient police force to keep the peace, and there would have been no trouble. The police force of the city was large enough to prevent disorder, if it had not been for the armed organizations patrolling the city; and the mayor stated that if he had had a police force large enough he would have kept them off the streets; but the organizations were too powerful for him to attempt to do anything with them. Any unarmed organization would have given no trouble whatever. The pretended patrol of the city consisted of mounted men organized as cavalry. They reported, from time to time, to the officers who had command of the rifle clubs during the night.

These armed organizations were accustomed to attend the political meetings. On one occasion the Butler Guards, named in honor of General Butler, of Edgeworth, were at a meeting in ward 8, which the mayor, apprehending danger, attended. He was called by them as he passed them, while within hearing of their words, "A damned radical son of a bitch." These clubs generally remained in the streets until after twelve o'clock, and a portion of them all night. From 25th August to 15th October there was a regular patrol from the clubs during the night. They rode through the back streets and in every part of the city. On several occasions they rode past his residence during the night with such demonstrations as to disturb the city. A good many of those who were members of the club were brought before the mayor's court, fined, punished, and their arms taken from them.

Most of the white people of the city belonged to these organizations. Nearly all the young men were members. The police force consisted of about equal proportions of whites and blacks. It was the purpose of the Government to maintain this equality. Some of those called black were nearly as white as other citizens. The police force consisted of eighty or ninety men. A portion of the officers voted the democratic ticket. The mayor offered, if they were dissatisfied with the police force, to appoint such men as should be named to him by the democrats. No complaint was made of the police organization until after the election. The colored people were organized as militia companies under the militia laws of the State. They had no other armed organization. The democratic rifle clubs were organized without authority and against the laws of the State. They declared that they were kept up for the purpose of defending themselves, if occasion should arise. In the absence of this or any other armed force, the mayor states that he would have been able to have maintained the peace of the city at all times. He said to General Hunt, who commanded the United States troops during the riot of the 8th October, that if his troops would keep these military organizations off the street, he (the mayor) would maintain the peace of the city, and would not ask the aid of the United States troops for that purpose. The only occasion for the support of those troops was to put down the rifle clubs in case of difficulty.

After the President's proclamation, the 17th of October, the clubs continued to assemble in their armories with arms. The mayor says that he saw them every evening for weeks with guns in their hands drilling in the armories. The riot of the 6th September excited great terror throughout the city, and business was practically suspended for several days. After the mayor's proclamation no negroes were on the streets with guns. At the conference held between the mayor and gentlemen connected with the rifle clubs, the mayor was told that if the police attempted to make any arrest of members of the clubs they would shoot them. This declaration, it is stated, was repeated to the mayor in person several times.

After the President's proclamation the clubs kept their armories until the day after the presidential election, and then they appeared on the streets again. At the time of the November riot, the day after the election, nearly a thousand men in arms were assembled on one of the principal streets within three-quarters of an hour.

It was stated by Mr. R. J. Magill, (page 237,) that he did not believe that there was a young man in the city of Charleston that did not belong to a rifle club. He, himself belonged to the Palmetto Club. And this might be said with equal truth of every other part of the State.

It will readily be seen that this armed occupation and control of the city in the manner described by the mayor gave to the democrats an immense and apparently irresistible influence upon public opinion. It can scarcely be doubted that this was one of the results contemplated in the original organization of the clubs.

PROSCRIPTION OF LABORERS.

Another method for the control of voters, calculated to secure the success of the new policy, was the assertion of the right and the constantly expressed determination of employers to direct and control the political action of those who were employed by them, by whatever means should be necessary. Various methods, which cannot here be enumerated, were adopted to secure that object, among others, the most effective were resolutions passed at public meetings asserting the right and determination to control the action of laboring men in that way. It was claimed by democrats that their trade and patronage belonged to themselves, and they were under no obligation to give them to persons whose political action did not accord with their views. "We insist," is the language of one of these resolutions, "that democrats shall no longer patronize republicans in trade or retain them in employment." Mechanics and workingmen, in consequence of this policy, it was supposed, would follow their employers in political action.

"The mechanics and workingmen of Charleston," it was said at one of these meetings, "are true as steel, and will follow the standard of Hampton wherever it shall lead them." They asserted that many democrats had been compelled for months to remain unemployed, while they were ready and able to fill such positions as teamster, porter, and every other position requiring muscle and brain, and that they were better able to fill those positions than most of the republicans that were then filling them. Resolutions were passed at public meetings in different parts of the city and county of this character, some of which are presented herewith, (see page —.)* Persons were appointed to give certificates of membership of democratic clubs, countersigned by the president, in order that the holders might be recognized and receive employment and patronage of democrats. Certificates of a similar character were also given to democrats recommending their employment by democrats, and to republicans recommending their employment by republicans, if they were in need of the services of such men. (Page 228.)

WITHHOLDING OFFICIAL BONDS FROM PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Another method was adopted with considerable success to discredit republican officers, State and national, by depriving them of the means of getting bondsmen, required by the Government as the condition of their appointment.

A general and public effort was made to prevent any citizen of South Carolina from becoming bondsman for any republican officers of the national or State governments. Resolutions were passed denouncing the persons who had given bonds heretofore for republican officers, and calling on them to withdraw them, and they did withdraw them. The postmaster of the city of Charleston, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is in that position. After his bond had been made and sent to Washington the persons who signed it withdrew their names. A new blank was furnished, and those who signed the first bond declined to sign it, on account of ostracism and threats by the democrats. There are many instances of this kind. The resolutions of one of the public meetings on this subject, published in the News and Courier, September 9, 1876, is printed herewith. The only result of this policy was that many county officers are holding commissions either without bonds or with insufficient bonds, to the detriment of the Government rather than that of the office-holders.

THE DEMOCRATIC MEETING IN WARD 8—FREE SPEECH SECURED AND PEACE PRESERVED.

* * * * * * *

The secretary here stated that he had been handed a set of resolutions by a resident of the ward, which he would read, and hoped that the meeting would give it their unanimous support. He then placed before the meeting the following

"RESOLUTIONS:

"Let us know who are the rich men in this city and State, be they democrats 'nominally' or 'black-hearted republicans,' who for money are aiding radical republican officials in waging war against our race and property, and who are responsible for every riot that occurs in our political campaign.

"Resolved, That this meeting, in behalf of the honest white voting population of South Carolina, ask the democratic papers of Charleston to arrange and publish in their columns an honest and exact directory of all the bonded officials in this State, their names, nativity, politics, office, official bond; the name of the bondsman, his nativity, politics, business, place of business, and the amount for which he bonds himself, and the consideration received by him, if the latter information is obtainable.

"Resolved, That it is the honest conviction of this meeting, and we believe of every honest citizen of the South, that no true and honorable democrat could sign his name as the bondsman and guarantee of any radical republican official in this State, he having been a resident in South Carolina since R. K. Scott was elected governor by the said republican party in 1868."

The resolutions were then placed before the meeting and adopted unanimously. (Page 165, part 2.)

A portion of the proceedings of that meeting was ruled out by the committee as incompetent testimony, but is here presented:

Mr. T. Barker Jones said in support of the resolutions that, as they said in ward 4, "Let every man show his hand." If you will take the trouble to ventilate this matter you will find upon the official bonds of those we are fighting against in this State men who claim to be democrats, and yet, as these resolutions fittingly express it, they are deep-dyed radicals. Those that are not with us are against us,

OFFICE OF S. S. FRASER, COMMISSION MERCHANT,
Georgetown, S. C., November 11, 1876.

and there are now so-called democrats upon the bonds of men like Worthington, Wallace, Bosemon, and others who should be required to show their hands. If they are democrats let them say so and act upon it. This matter has been brought up by the attempt of Bowen's pet, Birney, to take possession of the post-office, and it is a matter that should be thoroughly ventilated. These so-called democrats, by going on the bonds of radical officials, are countenancing the very men we are fighting to defeat and replace by honest citizens. These radicals were fire-brands in the community, and, if the truth were known, the very men who incited the poor ignorant colored people to create a riot on Wednesday night. Gentlemen, the crisis has come. We are fighting in a struggle which means life or death with us, and every man should show his hand. A revolution is at hand. We have seen the first of it, and we are now prepared to meet any other outbreak. If we are to have this pushed upon us by democrats, I say let us know who they are. We say to them, come off of these bonds. The radical office-holders cannot get bonds in their own party, and the offices will be left vacant for decent, honest men to fill the positions they are entitled to. [Cheers.]

[Editorial article from the News and Courier of September 12, 1876.]

DEMOCRATIC BONDSMEN OF RADICAL OFFICE-HOLDERS.

Any citizen of Charleston who now becomes a bondsman for a radical official is a worse foe to the cause of good government than if he boldly voted the rascally radical ticket at every election. In voting with the radicals he would do no more than any negro who will pass muster as of full age can do equally well, and more frequently; but in becoming, in these days, a surety upon the official bond of a radical appointee, the responsible citizen brings property and position to the rescue of such fellows as Birney, and gives to the public enemy the means of securing office-holders who will faithfully do their dirty work and hinder the success of the democracy.

"For eight years there had been no strict division of political parties in South Carolina. In 1870 the democrats generally voted for the Union reform candidate for governor, who was a republican. Two years later there were two radical candidates in the field, and democratic ballots were cast for both of them. In 1874 the democrats, with few exceptions, voted the independent republican ticket. There was, therefore, no political reason, from 1868 to 1876, why democrats should not, if so inclined, and if their personal interests lay in that direction, go upon the official bonds of State and Federal officials. No political principle was compromised by such a course; and while any act that made it practicable for incompetent or unprincipled persons to hold public office cannot be justified, the doing of that act was not, under the circumstances, such a breach of faith as would call for public reprobation. But since the meeting of the State democratic convention and the nomination of Hampton and Simpson, the conditions are changed. What was excusable a few months ago is, if done to-day, an offense against the community.

"The democratic canvass in South Carolina is broad in its aspect and liberal in its punishment of the radical rioters. Nothing short of that will satisfy them. Until that is done they will not abate a tittle of their vigilance; and until then, executive proclamations, so far as they contemplate the disarming of the whites and the disbanding of their forces, will be no more regarded than so many sheets of blank paper."

THE KING-STREET RIOT.

As soon as General Hampton was nominated, meetings were called to advocate his election. Some of the colored republicans went over to the democratic party. One of them, Isaac B. Rivers, was a man of talent, and had been active in support of the independent republican ticket, and from that went to the democrats. Another colored man, named Sawyer, went with him. Their speeches excited much opposition, and they declined to attend other meetings unless they were assured protection, which was promised them.

The 6th of September, 1876, a democratic meeting was held at Archer's Hall, corner of King and Green streets, which Rivers and Sawyer attended. There were about twenty-five to thirty colored men and seventy-five white men present. The colored men were democrats. During the evening, colored men who had been at republican meetings, on their way home, stopped about the door of Archer's Hall. There were in all about twenty or thirty of them. Some went into the hall. Rivers, Sawyer, Riley, and Jenkins, colored democrats, made speeches. When the colored republicans reached the hall Sawyer was speaking, and when he finished, Jenkins, who presided, made some remarks, and then proposed a resolution, that all the colored women employed as cooks by the white people should be dismissed, because they fed their republican friends from the cook-pots. They took the first cuts from the steaks, and coffee and other things for their husbands, who stuck to the republican party. If the women were dismissed, he said, they could not feed their husbands, who would then vote the democratic ticket.

Grant, Chamberlain, and Bowen were denounced as thieves. These remarks excited opposition. The lie was given to the speaker. Efforts were made to put out the intruders. A row commenced, the lights were put out, and the meeting adjourned. When Jenkins came out, the men whose wives had been assailed by him endeavored to call him to an account for what he had said. The white men who protected them thought it necessary to prevent that, and the two bodies of men moved up Green street in irregular parallel columns or crowds, from fifty to seventy-five men in each body. Various complimentary remarks passed between them, and some missiles were thrown, and a few pistol-shots were heard. The police arrived, and the crowds increased on all sides. Attempts were made to arrest the man who was said to have fired the first shot, and after much violence and disorder one of the police officers was killed. He was shot by Mr. Barnwell, a white democrat, the witness from whose testimony this statement is mostly taken.

The disturbance began about ten o'clock in the evening, and continued for several hours with violence. The people of the city were panic-stricken, and business was suspended the next day. There was undoubtedly much political excitement and angry partisanship, but not more than often occurs in populous cities when parties are engaged, as these were, "in a life and death struggle for supremacy." That men should have resented such aspersions as were cast at this meeting upon their own wives and daughters, with acrimonious retort and denunciation, or sought an explanation from the speakers of the defamatory charges made against them, ought to have been anticipated and cannot be unreservedly condemned.

The leader of the democrats, and a witness against the republicans, Mr. Joseph Barnwell, a white man, who assisted in getting up the meeting at Archer's Hall, made a speech there himself, encouraged Rivers, Jenkins, and Sawyer to make speeches, and, although he knew that disturbance had occurred at previous meetings where these men had spoken, gave no notice to the city authorities and called for no policemen to maintain order, but went down to ask the assistance of a democratic club meeting in case of trouble. When the meeting adjourned he appears to have taken charge of the assembly until the close of the riot. Upon his own statement, he shot a policeman who came to aid in suppressing the disorder and who gave no provocation for the deadly assault made upon him. Buckner, a white democrat, who was killed by a pistol-shot, declared at the moment of his death that Barnwell shot him, and a third man, who was wounded in the leg, it was alleged, was also shot by Barnwell. These were the only persons who were seriously injured.

These facts prove conclusively that the managers of the meeting were not equal to the responsibilities they assumed and were incompetent to direct or control the assembly they had brought together. The mayor of the city said that if the authorities had been informed that the meeting was to take place, no disorder would have occurred. The republicans who attended the meeting, and those who sought an explanation of the charges made against them and their wives, with one exception, testified that they were unarmed and did not wish to create any disturbance. The exception was a witness who volunteered his testimony and was unknown to the committee and the other witnesses. He presented himself at the headquarters of the democracy, where the committee held its sessions, and gave his testimony under circumstances which excited a suspicion that his presence and his testimony might have been intended to serve some personal interest of his own. There were several unsuccessful attempts at imposition of this character. It is unjust to assume, in the presence of these facts, that the disorders of the 6th of September can be justly charged to republicans or the republican party.

MEETINGS FOR JOINT DISCUSSION.

Joint discussions were also solicited by democrats for democratic and republican speakers at republican meetings. Hon. C. C. Bowen, chairman of the republican executive committee of the county, whose testimony is printed on page 153, states that he canvassed the city and county thoroughly and called several public meetings during the presidential campaign. They were called by himself, as county chairman of the republican party. They were advertised in the papers, naming the persons who would speak and the days when they would be held. The first meeting was at Biggin Church, soon after the nomination of General Hampton. Between three hundred and four hundred persons were present, nearly all republicans. A few democrats were there, who took no part in the meeting. That was the first republican meeting at which democrats had presented themselves. The next republican meeting was at Strawberry Ferry, a week or ten days later. Some days before the meeting took place the democrats solicited the republicans to allow a joint discussion of the political questions of the day, the democrats to have one-half the time. Their request was agreed to.

When the day of the meeting arrived some excitement occurred among the republicans by an advertisement in the city journals that a steamer was to leave with a number of democrats on board for the meeting at Strawberry Ferry. This fact produced a great deal of excitement at the meeting, and a fear that somebody was going to be killed that day. The democrats who came by the steamer numbered about one hundred and fifty men, all armed with Winchester rifles. They stopped at the landing-place, two or three hundred yards from the meeting, and sent a committee to make arrangements in regard to speeches. The republicans objected to calling the meeting to order. They had heard that threats had been made through the country, and believed that the democratic party meant mischief. On the assurance that no difficulty should occur, the arrangement for the meeting proceeded. A few minutes later a company of horsemen from Mount Pleasant came up They were thirty or forty in number, and had ridden fifty-five miles the night before to attend the meeting. A little later another company of fifty men made its appearance from Summerville. They had ridden fifty miles to attend the meeting. There was a great deal of angry talk at this meeting, and they got through with much difficulty.

At this meeting General Ferguson, of Mississippi, was one of the speakers. He was a red-hot democrat. One of the speakers censured the republicans for having caused a strike among laborers on the rice plantations on Cooper River, and denounced the republicans as liars and thieves, which created great excitement. General Ferguson's speech was of a different character. He had come down, as he said, to instruct the white people in what he called "the Mississippi plan of carrying the State." He repeated a great many times that they were going to do it peaceably if they could, and, if not, then forcibly. They would do it anyhow; the present state of things could not exist any longer. His speech was violent and bitter. All the democratic speakers assumed that the colored people had been told that they were to be put back into slavery if the democratic party succeeded. They said the colored people could not expect white people to employ them if they continued to vote against the interests of the white men. The republicans made replies, during the meeting, to the statements made by the democratic speakers. The meeting was attended with great excitement, and the least disturbance would have caused a riot that none could have controlled. The democrat who had proposed the joint discussion at the Strawberry meeting, when it was consented to, went directly to a hardware store and purchased twenty-four Army revolvers, (page 156.)

Other meetings were held at Mount Pleasant the 6th October, a second meeting at Strawberry Ferry the 7th, at Red-top Church the 9th, at Whaley's Church the 10th, at John's Island the 11th, at Wadmelaw Island the 12th, at the lower end of John's Island the 13th, and at Edisto Island the 14th, and the 16th a meeting was held at Cainhoy. No arrangement had been made for joint discussion of any kind at this meeting. The democrats solicited the privilege of joint discussion at the meeting at Mount Pleasant, which was objected to on account of the manner in which the republicans had been treated at Strawberry Ferry meeting. After an assurance that order should be maintained and that the incidents of Biggin Church meeting should not be repeated, the republicans consented to the joint discussion at Mount Pleasant. No serious trouble occurred, though the speakers were interrupted, and the lie was passed very frequently from some of the democrats to the republican speakers. It was with the utmost difficulty that a fight was prevented. There were no arms on either side except pistols. Most of them, the democrats especially, had pistols.

At the second meeting at Strawberry Ferry, the democrats sent up a boat from the city, and insisted on a joint discussion. There had been no agreement to that effect, and no one had proposed it. Objections were made by the republicans to a joint discussion, but, as the democrats had come, they consented to give them part of the time. The meeting was less violent than the first one at that place; but the men were all armed with pistols, their rifles having been left on board the boat. No trouble occurred at the Red-top church meeting. The democrats did not attend, nor did they attend the Whaley's church meeting. The next meeting was at John's Island. Written propositions were made by the democratic executive committee to the chairman of the republican committee suggesting that both parties unite in holding their meeting at places and times selected by the republicans for joint discussion of the question at issue. This proposition was assented to on condition that such meetings should not be attended by armed men, which was agreed to.

It was also stipulated by the republicans that another class of people from the city should not be allowed to attend any of these meetings. This had reference to an organization called the Butler Guards. It was agreed that no members of this organization should attend any of these meetings. About thirty democrats attended a meeting at John's Island, beside their speakers. They had one-half the time, but made no converts. No trouble occurred at this meeting, and none at Wadmalaw. Late in the afternoon about seventy-five democrats arrived, and two of the democratic speakers closed the meeting. About thirty democrats attended the second meeting at John's Island. It was a quiet meeting. At Edisto, a steamer came from the city with from seventy-five to a hundred democrats. They brought a German band. There were six hundred or seven hundred persons at the meeting. All the democrats present were from the city of Charleston. At the second meeting at John's Island one colored man announced himself as a democrat. At the close of the meeting at Edisto the democrats gave three cheers for the republicans, and the republicans gave three cheers for the democrats, but the democrats admitted they had made no converts.

THE RIOT AT CAINHOY.

The next meeting was at Cainhoy, Monday, the 16th of October, which terminated in a riot, and was the last of the joint discussions in the county. At this meeting, as at others, the democrats were admitted to the discussion on the express condition that they should not go there armed, and that the members of the Butler Guards should not be permitted to attend, for reasons which were stated and were perfectly well understood between the parties. About two hundred and fifty democrats left Charleston by the steamer on the day appointed for the meeting. There were no more than fifteen or twenty republicans on board; among them was Mr. Bowen. The leaders of the democrats, who had attended other meetings, were absent at this, and no one appeared to be in charge of the party, or to know anything about the arrangements for the meeting. A considerable number of the persons whose attendance had been objected to were on board the steamer. Some of them were offensive in their conversation. On the voyage they fired their pistols at objects they saw in the water. Nearly all the democrats of the parish, about seventy-four in number, were at the landing to meet them.

The arrangements for the meeting were satisfactory, and made without delay. A democratic chairman was chosen to preside for the democrats, Mr. Samuel Sanders, and a republican, a colored man named Stewart, to represent the republican party. Mr. Jervey, a democrat, was the first speaker. He spoke the time allotted to him in perfect silence, without interruption. The stand on which the speakers stood was a table, about ten feet long, under an oak tree. They were facing the east. The democrats and republicans occupied different sides of the space around and in front of the table, the crowds meeting each other a little to the right of the center. On the left, from 20 to 40 feet from the stand, a little to the rear of it, was an old weather-house, with a wide opening, without doors in the north and south ends, intended as a protection for carriages and teams in rough weather. There was an old chimney in the north wall. In front, and a little to the right of the stand, was a church, and a small building occupied as a vestry still farther in front and to the right. In the rear of the stand was a small pine wood, running down to a kind of swamp.

The speakers faced the east, the weather-house on the left, the church in front, a little to the right, and the vestry still farther to the right and front. When Mr. Jervey concluded his speech he was followed by Mr. McKinley, a colored republican. He had spoken but one or two sentences when he was interrupted by a noise to the left, on the republican side. Supposing that this interruption was caused by an opponent, and feeling that he had a right to be heard with the same attention paid to Mr. Jervey, he turned in the direction of the noise and said, "I am here in your interest," and asked them to be silent. Some one then exclaimed, "Look out, McKinley, they are going to shoot." He turned to the left, in the same direction, and saw several young white men with guns in their hands, directly turned toward the stand, in the old weather-house. They stood in the door-way nearest to the platform, about ten or twelve in number. McKinley jumped off the stand, and drew the attention of Mr. Jervey, Mr. O'Connor, the democratic nominee for Congress in that district, and some other democrats, saying, "Look! these are your men with guns in their hands, and to-morrow it will be said that we (meaning the republican party) started this row."

No person was on the platform when McKinley was speaking except Mr. Sanders, the democratic chairman, and himself. Mr. McKinley jumped on the platform again, and asked the people to hear him. At that moment he heard a discharge from some fire-arm, and shortly afterward the firing became general. The shot came from the left, from the direction of the old weather-house but whether from within or outside he did not know. He did not see the person from whom it came. He endeavored to quell the riot so far as he could. He left the ground about ten minutes after he heard the shots. He says (page 246) that the guns in the hands of the white men were "smooth-bores, single-barreled guns, old-time muskets." McKinley says there was no one in the rear of the house. Up to the time of the interruption there was no bad blood or ill-feeling manifested. Mr. Bowen says, (page 161,) "When the interruption occurred and attention was called to the men in the weather-house who had guns, the crowd separated, and the space between the stand and the house was immediately cleared," and he saw ten or a dozen white men standing with guns in their hands. Their actions indicated mischief. Their guns were raised in the position for firing, the muzzles of the guns depressed.

Some of the men who went up on the boat were the men who had been objected to. Bowen immediately went to O'Connor, put his hand on his shoulder, and said, "Those are your men with guns; make them stop at once." O'Connor called out, "What are you doing with those guns?" They made no reply, but commenced backing off to the rear of the building and falling in line. As soon as they got out and into line the first shot was fired. Mr. Bowen says he saw an old man fall, and in ten or fifteen seconds after he saw the man that fired the shot fall. The firing became general in the rear of the old building. The white men discharged their guns, threw them on the ground, and drew their pistols. The main body of the democrats took no part in it. Some one asked Bowen to intercede with the republicans to stop firing, and he replied that he would do it if a democrat would go with him to protect him from fire in the rear. Mr. George Rivers Walker accompanied him.

The firing was suppressed until Mr. Walker retired. Mr. Bowen says that if he had remained the fight would have stopped there. The fight was continued until the democrats retreated. This riot occurred after the proclamation of the governor and the President against rifle-clubs.

Abram Smith (colored) says (page 253) he was at the Cainhoy meeting; that McKinley was introduced on the republican side. He spoke about four or five words, when three women ran out from an old building to the left, that appeared like a place to drive carriages in, and said, "The democrats has those republican guns!" "I heard some one say, 'Look out!' then bang, bang, from a gun; then I saw an old man fall right in the road about ten or fifteen feet from the back of the building, and looking toward the place from where I heard the firing, there was fifteen democrats, each man having a musket in his hand." Question (page 253) by Mr. BANKS: "Where were you standing when this colored man who was shot fell?—Answer. I was standing on the left of the stand, and could see right through the building. Question. Where was the colored man standing who fell?—Answer. About ten or fifteen feet the other side of the building. Question. To the rear or beyond it?—Answer. Beyond it. Question. Did you see where the shot came from?—Answer. The shot came from just a little to the right of the rear of the building. This man, Cyrus Galliard, had been speaking to the man, and had just left him, leaning on his stick. Question. Did you see the man that shot the gun?—Answer. Yes; it was a white man. Question. Where did he stand?—Answer. At and beyond the building, and fired at the man who stood in the rear of the building. Question. Did you see any other man shot?—Answer. No, sir; I did not know anything about it, until next morning I read it in the paper." (Page 254.) Question by Mr. COCHRANE, (page 255:) "Just as quick as you heard the women run out and tell about these guns, and heard some voice cry, 'Look out!' you saw the shot, and saw the old man fall?—Answer. I didn't say 'saw the shot;' I say, heard the report of the gun. Then I looked. Question. Then you looked to where you heard the report, and you saw fifteen white men with muskets; each one had a gun; they were looking to the platform, and pointing their guns in that direction?—Answer. Yes, sir."

Here is the testimony of Smith and other witnesses upon this point:

ABRAM SMITH (colored) sworn and examined, (pages 253, 254.)

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. At Mount Pleasant, Charleston County.
Q. What is your business?
A. I am a trial justice, sir.
Q. What is your age?
A. Forty-three.
Q. Do you know anything of the affair that happened at Cainhoy at a republican meeting there about the middle of October?
A. I was there, sir.
Q. What time did you get there?
A. I went there on the steamer Pocosin. I arrived at the village of Cainhoy between one and half past one o'clock.
Q. What time did you get to the meeting?
A. We got to the meeting about two o'clock. * * *
Q. Was the meeting called to order before the whites came?
A. No, sir. Mr. Stewart was chairman on the republican side and Mr. Sanders on the democratic side. Then Mr. St. Julian Jervey was introduced as the first speaker on the democrat side; he spoke his time out.
Q. What was his time?
A. Half an hour. It was to be half an hour to each. As soon as Mr. Jervey got through the band struck up the music. The band stopped and Mr. William McKinley was introduced on the republican side. Mr. McKinley spoke about four or five words. There was three women in an old building to the left that appeared like it was a place some time back to drive carriages in.
Q. Where was the building with reference to the platform?
A. To the left. The women ran out and says, "The democrats has those republicans' guns." I hear, "Look out!" I hear bang, bang from a gun; then I saw an old man fall right in the road, just about ten or fifteen feet from the back part of the building, and looking toward the place from where I hear the firing there was fifteen democrats, each man having a musket in his hand.
Q. Well, sir, what did they do?
A. They were standing with the guns in their hands like to the platform. Mr. Bowen said to Mr. O'Connor, "Those mens with guns in their hands is your mens." Mr. O'Conner says, "Where did you get those guns?" The answer was, "We captured them." Some one say, "Hold on to them." I don't know whether it was Mr. O'Conner who said it. Then the crowd of colored men rushed to this old building to make up to those men and appear like each man lay hold to a man and they commenced tusseling with the guns, and some of the white men dropped the guns and run.
Q. Were the men they laid hold of white men?
A. Yes, sir; and while they were tussling with the guns, the guns fired off, but no one didn't get shot at the time. Then I saw colored men coming from different parts of the bushes with guns, and after they came out of the bushes, I think there was ten or fifteen men was coming up with guns toward where the democrats were standing in a crowd together. Some of the democrats said: "Mr. Bowen, for God's sake, protect us." Mr. Bowen then was standing with the democrats. Mr. Bowen says: "I am not going to face those muskets and leave my back in the rear. If some of you democrats will go along with me I will go and speak to stop those mens." Mr. George Walker stepped from the crowd of democrats right behind Mr. Bowen, and Mr. Bowen and Mr. Walker went and spoke to them, the colored mens with guns in their hands, and the mens with the guns in their hands dispersed, and by the time Mr. Walker returned back to the democrat crowd, the democrat crowd began to run back toward Cainhoy village, and I heard firing of guns. And I heard firing of guns after the crowd leaved the church, but I don't know what was done after that. I staid there until the last.

By Mr. COCHRANE, (page 255:)

Question. Well, what was the first thing that you heard after McKinley got up?
Answer. After McKinley got up on the stand and spoke about four or five words——
Q. Then you heard the first thing?
A. The first thing I heard was these three women came out of the building and said, "The democrats have those men's guns."
Q. The republicans' guns?
A. Yes, sir; the republicans' guns.
Q. They ran out, if I correcly understand, and said, "The democrats have the republicans' guns." Then you heard some one say, "Look out!" Then you heard the report of a gun, and then saw an old black man, ten or fifteen feet away from the building, fall?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Just as quick as you heard the women run out and tell about these guns, and heard some voice cry, "look out," you saw the shot and saw the old man fall?
A. I didn't say, "saw the shot;" I say heard the report of the gun; then I looked.
Q. Then you looked to where you heard the report, and you saw fifteen white men with muskets; each one had a gun; they were looking to the platform, and pointing their guns in that direction? That was the next step in the programme?
A. Yes, sir.

JAMES H. MONTMOLIN (colored) sworn and examined, (pages 256, 257.)

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. What is your business?
Answer. At present I am boating on the Santee River, about fifty-one miles from here.
Q. Where do you reside?
A. Well, I have been there for the last fifteen or eighteen days. I belonged to Savannah. Formerly I've lived in Charleston for four years, more or less.
Q. What is your age?
A. I was born the 23d of September, 1844; that makes me thirty-two years old.
Q. Were you at the meeting at Cainhoy in October?
A. I was, sir; on the 16th of October.
Q. What time did you get there?
A. I left the city about nine o'clock in the morning on the boat, and I got there, I suppose, about eleven o'clock.
Q. Do you refer to arriving at the landing?
A. Yes, sir; to the landing at Cainhoy village.
Q. What time did you get to the meeting?
A. I don't think we got there till about a few minutes of twelve.
Q. Well, sir, tell us what you saw or what you know of your own knowledge as to the transactions of that meeting.
A. There was a joint discussion betwcen the republicans and democrats at Cainhoy on the 16th of October. It was agreed upon here in the city to have a joint discussing. There is where they met. The meeting was called to order shortly after I got there and all parties had arrived, by the republican chairman, C. C. Bowen. He then announced to the democratic party that he was ready to open the meeting. They sent forth their chairman to the stand and introduced to the audience Mr. Jervey; I don't know his other name. Mr. Jervey I suppose spoke about half an hour, not interrupted at all by neither party. He was notified by Mr. O'Connor that his time was up. They had limited each speaker to half an hour. When he was notified that his time was up they brought forth a man by the name of McKinley as a republican speaker and introduced him the same, and he mounted the stand, and while he did that the band of music commenced to play. While McKinley was getting ready to speak some one of the colored people said, "Stop the music, and let's hear what our side has to say." The music stopped. McKinley had spoken about a half a minute when some one hollered out, "Look out, McKinley, you're goin' to be killed." I then turned my face towards an old weather-house, or carriage-house, as it is called, which was formerly used to keep horses and carriages out of the wet when they came to the church, and there I saw about fifteen or sixteen white men with old muskets in their hands. I could look right through the doors. There was two doors to it, and it opened right facing to the stand, and you could look right through it. Three of them was on the inside and the balance was in the rear of the door of the building. The three men that were inside looked as though they wanted to shoot some one; they had their pieces in position as if they were wanting to use them. The whole thing was inside of a half a minute. At that moment the crowd broke from the speakers' stand, running both toward the swamp and toward the church—I mean to say that the entire crowd around the speakers' stand. As the crowd broke there was a shot fired from the rear of the building, and it killed an old man about ten feet from where Bowen stood. He was going toward the swamp. Then there was three or four more shots fired from the rear of the building, which was returned.

Q. Do you know from whence the first shot came?

A. I don't know, sir; I couldn't identify anybody.

Q. Did you see the man that fired?

A. No, sir; I didn't see the man that fired the shot, but I saw the men who had the guns in their hands; and as the crowd broke the old man was shot in my sight. I heard the report and saw the man when he fell, but didn't go to him to see where he was shot and by whom he was shot, because I was going up toward the church. On my way to the church I met Mr. Bowen and Mr. O'Conner about ten feet from the speakers' stand. Mr. Bowen said to Mr. O'Conner, "Those are your men with those guns in their hands; go and stop them." But I didn't stay to hear the reply; I kept on, and met Mr. Walker, who was standing right in front of the church, who cried out two or three times, "White men, hold the ground!" He had in his hands what looked to be an English navy revolver. He had it right across the barrel, in his right hand. In that time the firing became general. The firing then was from both sides; but I got away from it; I didn't stay to see any more of it.

Q. Did you see the man that fired that first shot?

A. No, sir; I don't know who it was. I only know where the shot came from, because I was at one end of the building myself.

Q. Was there any disturbance in the meeting before this cry was made that they were going to shoot?

A. No, sir; they were just as quiet as they could be.

Q. Are you a republican yourself?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether the colored men expected any trouble that day?

A. No, sir; I don't think so, sir, because heretofore at meetings there had been men coming from ten, fifteen, or twenty miles, bringing their arms, and they stacked them right at the stand; but on this occasion they had been advised not to bring arms. On this occasion there was no arms seen by me at all.

Q. Had you any arms yourself—pistol, knife, club, or anything of that sort?

A. No, sir; nothing of the kind.

The testimony above given is substantially all that was taken on the part of the republicans. The point of interest in the inquiry was, what caused the conflict, and who fired the first shot? There is no conflict in the testimony on either part as to the fact that the men in the weather-house, who were seen with guns in their hands, pointing to the stand, when McKinley was interrupted by the cry, "Look out, they are going to shoot," were white men and democrats who had come up in the steamer from the city. Mr. Thomas S. Grimke, a democrat, a conservative, whose father-in-law, Mr. Simmons, was one of the persons killed, says that after the first disturbance occurred and a pistol had been discharged, upon looking through the windows of the old house he saw a number of white men in there with guns. This surprised him, he said, "because they had gone up entirely unarmed, in accordance with their agreement with the radicals." Before the colored man was killed "there was a contest between a young man and a negro having a gun. I saw," he says, "the negro stoop down and try to pick up a brick to strike him with, and the young man try to draw his pistol, but don't know whether he drew it or not," (page 229.) These were undoubtedly the same men that were seen by Bowen, Smith, and Montmolin, and the contest is probably that described by Smith, (page 253.) Mr. Grimke says the democrats were armed with pistols. Their agreement was not to bear arms. When he said the agreement was not to carry arms, he meant "guns." (Page 231.)

Mr. George Rivers Walker, an earnest and much excited witness, explains in his testimony (pages 215, 216) how the young white men (democrats) came to be in possession of the guns, and who they were. "Intelligence was brought to me," he says, "by a party of young men immediately upon my arrival on the ground that there were a number of guns hidden in a chimney in the old house. They came to me, accustomed to take my advice in other matters, for advice as to what they should do in regard to these guns. I instructed them to closely watch the guns, but not to touch them unless there was an attack or direct signs of treachery.

"An ex-officer of an organization known as the Butler Guards was present with these young men, and evidently had them under his command—when I say under his command, I mean that they obeyed him—and the men on the ground informed me that he followed my advice rigidly, and gave no order for the seizure of the guns, nor were they seized until the negroes were advancing upon the squad of white men on a bayonet-charge."

But there is other testimony, given by eye-witnesses of this affair the day after it occurred, which will aid those who desire to know the truth. The laws of South Carolina require an inquest to be held by properly appointed officers in the case of every person who suffers death by violence. Such an inquiry was made concerning those killed in the riot at Cainhoy. The testimony of the coroner's inquest, properly certified, was offered to the committee, but was not regarded as competent testimony. It is, however, appended to this report, on the part of the minority, as important testimony, given under oath, in pursuance of judicial inquiry required by law, by officers appointed for that purpose, and comes from men who participated in the meeting and the scenes that followed the day after the transaction, and all of whom, with the exception of Abram Smith, Montmolin, and perhaps one other, were democrats

This testimony confirms that given by the republicans in the investigation intrusted to the committee of the House.

NOTES FROM OFFICIAL COPY OF TESTIMONY TAKEN BY CORONER ON THE RIOT AT CAINHOY, OCTOBER 16, 1876.

Thomas S. Grimke said he did not know who caused the death of W. E. Simmons, nor whether the wound was from the shot of a musket or pistol. When he came to the ground he went to the left of the stand about ten feet, and fifteen feet in the rear of the weather-house, to ascertain the temper of the colored people; found them quiet, good-natured, and willing to listen. McKinley had spoken but a few minutes when some one on the right of the stand cried, "Look out!" A pistol was fired, by whom he did not know, but from the right of the speakers' stand, the open building or weather-house being on the left. It was followed by a gun in the woods at the rear of the stand, and then, hearing the sound of rushing men, he looked up, and directly through the weather-house he saw a number of armed white men. The crowd in his neighborhood—he was among the colored men—began to move to the south. A number of shots were fired in the mean time. The men who had the guns rushed out of the south end of the building across the road, and the firing became general. He moved to the edge of the road running north and south, and feeling a pressure against him, turned and saw a white-headed negro fall to the ground, the blood spouting in a stream from his chest. Don't know who shot him. After the death of the negro he gave up all hope of stopping the riot, and retreated to the rear of the vestry. The negro was the first one killed, but he was not killed by the first shot. There were one hundred and fifty to two hundred passengers on the steamer. Saw nothing indicating hostility between white and colored people. It was one of the most peaceable meetings he ever attended.

R. C. McClure was present at the meeting, when John Lachicotti, a colored man, was killed. He was killed by the first shot fired. Would have heard it if any other shot had been fired. Saw guns in the hands of white and colored men. Whites took no guns with them, but got them from a small building where the speaking was going on. Cannot swear positively that the first shot killed Lachicotti.

Abram Smith was at the meeting ten or fifteen minutes before the democrats arrived. He told the colored people, by request of Mr. Bowen, to be orderly, and listen to both sides. When McKinley had spoken a few words he heard some one sing out, "Look out, McKinley, you are going to be shot." He looked at the old building, and saw twelve or fifteen men with guns in their hands; heard a shot from the same direction, and saw an old colored man fall dead. Some one on the democratic side asked where they got the guns. They said they captured them. The colored men said, "They are our guns;" and endeavored to get them. Some of the colored men went to the woods and came back with their guns. Some one on the democratic side said to the white men who had the guns, "Hold on to your arms." The firing then commenced and soon became general. Some of those who seized the guns fired them and threw them on the ground. Bowen and Walker endeavored to stop the firing. Those Bowen spoke to stopped, and the democrats ceased firing while Bowen and Walker were with the colored men.

William L. Venning resides at Cainhoy. He was on the west side of stand at meeting. The first indication of difficulty was in the movement of men back and forth on the stand and men and women running from the old building—both white and colored men. The colored men ran down the hill. Some of the whites had arms. The colored men who ran down the hill got their guns. Don't know where the white men with guns went. I then went to the vestry, when the firing became general on all sides. I went out again to look for my mules, left with the teamsters, and returned to vestry. There were several persons there; among them Mr. Simmons. The vestry was surrounded by negroes. A colored man put his head out of the window of the vestry and said, "We are all friends, and unarmed." All that were in the building then left, except Mr. Simmons. Don't know whether he followed or not. Don't know that we were fired at when we left the building; we might have been. Don't know who hurt Mr. Simmons. I think the first shot was fired from the farther end of the weather-house."

I. B. Douan resides in Charleston. Was at meeting by invitation of public advertisement.* Went with a pocket-pistol (a revolver, with seven chambers) like the size of a duck-shot pistol. Saw a black man with gash on the side of his jaw; a terrible big gash. Was retreating when he heard shooting in the window of the vestry, and heard some one say, "O, God!" I said to a man in front of me some one must have been hurt in the vestry. All had left but Mr. Simmons; I was the last man, in the rear of the others; had a gun that I captured on my shoulder.

William J. McKinley is register of deeds. Was at meeting; spoke from the stand one or two minutes; heard a little confusion to the left where the republicans were standing, when some one cried out, "Look out, McKinley, they are going to shoot." Looking to the left, saw in the building known as the weather-house several white men with guns in their hands pointing toward the stand. I jumped from the stand and said to O'Connor, Feeken, and Jervey, "Look, these are your men with guns in their hands, and to-morrow it will be said the republicans started this." Then heard a discharge of some weapon, and the confusion became general. Democrats went to south; republicans north. When disturbance began, I was facing the church; weather-house on right, vestry on left, and my back to woods.

Martin R. Delany resides at Charleston. He was at Cainhoy, October 16. When the firing was going on a number of persons were dodging, and he told them they had better go into the vestry if they did not want to be hit. A squad of colored men came down the hill with guns in position of charge bayonets; and he told them all were friends in the vestry and without arms. We all left, then, except Mr. Simmons, who was alive when I left the ground.

M. P. O'Connor was the democratic nominee for Congress. He resides in Charleston. He went to Cainhoy on Potocsin steamer; rode to meeting with Jervey, Ficken, and Sanders. Some of the Palmetto and Butler Guards were on board. Both companies are military organizations. The colored people were packed around the table when we came up. The democrats, when they came up from the boat, gathered between the colored people and the vestry. The table (or stand) was situated in front of the church; in the rear of the table a bench; on the left of the table a building called the weather-house; on the right of the table, and oblique to the left, a small vestry-room. He sat on the right of the bench while Dervey was speaking. The audience was very quiet, attentive, and serious. McKinley followed, and when he had spoken a few sentences the witness saw a number of colored men running away around the weather-house down the hill. He looked to see what had started them supposing a horse had got loose; and turning again to the front he saw the whole crowd scattering, and cried, "Order! order!" and in an instant heard the sound of a musket, the sound of which appeared to come from the rear of the weather-house, and between it and the bushes where the negroes were running to.

As soon as he heard the musket-shot he looked to the left, through the weather-house, and saw outside eight or nine white men with muskets in their hands. They were in a cluster. Seeing that he became alarmed, and cried out, "What are you doing with those arms?" Before he could get to the corner of the weather-house where the white men were who had arms in their hands, I saw colored men approaching from the bushes with guns. Before he could reach the corner of the weather-house heard a fusillade of musketry, and pistol-shots also. He took shelter from the bullets; doesn't know what became of the white men who had arms. The fusillade of muskets and pistols which he heard at this time proceeded—some of it—from the rear of the weather-house, and much of it in the direction of the vestry. Hurried across the space to the vestry; saw in the rear of it fifteen or twenty men, principally white, and a number of whites flying down the road to Cainhoy. While McKinley was on the stand he called my attention to the white men with arms in their hands; doesn't know whether the white men had arms before or after the first shot. Heard no threats or insults offered on the ground; doesn't know what caused the death of Mr. Simmons.

Samuel Sanders, chairman of the meeting and of the democratic party of the parish, said he was at Cainhoy; rode up with O'Connor, Dervey, and Ficken. Doesn't know who it was that hurt or caused the death of Mr. Simmons, unless it was done by the general riot. Was chairman of meeting on democratic side. When Dervey was nearly through his speech a parcel of lads, sixteen to eighteen years old, about ten or twelve in number, that came from Charleston on the steamer, left our side of the meeting, (that is, the democratic side,) went around to the rear of the colored men, toward the carriage or weather-house. McKinley followed Dervey, and had said a dozen words or more, when he saw the colored people in a commotion, and looking into the weather-house he saw the lads who left the democratic side and went around to the weather-house taking guns from the chimney or near it. They had no guns when they went there. Several of the colored people rushed into the building and struggled to get the guns away from them. In the struggle one of the white boys fell to the ground, and at that instant a fire-arm went off. The shot was near the chimney; doesn't know whether it was a gun or pistol,

*One of the methods of calling attention of democrats to republican meetings is exhibited in the following notice taken from the editorial columns of the News and Courier, Charleston, October 9, 1876:

"LOOK OUT!—There is to be a big radical meeting in Kingstree on Thursday. Efforts have been made to prevent the democrats from knowing anything about it. Now, they are forewarned."

nor whether it was inside or outside the building. This was the first shot that was fired. It was not more than ten feet from where the struggle for the guns occurred.

As soon as the shot was fired some of the colored people started to run, other colored men cried, "Get your guns! Get your guns! They are shooting!" They ran southwestward from the building to the bushes and got their guns. The men who were struggling for the guns went out of the north end of the building. Two or three shots were fired by the crowd from that end of the building, and after a while five or six shots from different directions. Then he saw the old colored man (Uncle John) fall about forty or fifty yards from the weather-house. Up to this time he had remained on the stand. He then started for the vestry-room, and met Mr. Bowen coming from the democratic side, and said, "You can stop this riot, and, for God's sake, do so." Bowen said he would do anything in his power to stop it. He went with another gentleman (Mr. Walker) toward the colored people, and appeared to be using every exertion to stop the riot. Sanders then went toward the democratic party, and meeting some of them coming back toward the vestry with pistols, said, "For God's sake, get away from here; we did not come here for fighting; it is time for us to retreat; and they all went down to the village. He (Sanders) does not believe the riot was a premeditated affair by either party, but was brought about by the young men who seized the guns of the colored men in the building.

W. S. Elfe.—Before the meeting opened some of the colored men said they would not hear Major Melany (a colored democrat) speak. While Jervey was speaking some one interrupted him, and several colored men rose up and ordered that all should keep quiet and be polite. Elfe was not in a position to see the men in the weather-house who seized the guns there. When returning home, after having gone to within a quarter of a mile of the steamer, he met some white men on the road with guns, and asked where they got them, and they said, "At the Brick church." No one but himself had a gun at the church. "I took a gun to hunt on the way." Did not fire a gun during the riot. "Three or four of us were deer-hunting on our way to the meeting." One was a colored man and the others white men. They all took their guns to the meeting. Elfe's gun was loaded with buckshot.

M. I. Murray was at the meeting. In addition to the free ride, he was paid $1. He took it because the rest of the members of his company took it, with some exceptions. It was paid by B. E. Robinson. He formerly belonged to the Montgomery Guards, but at the time of the riot to the Butler Guards. He took no part in the riot. He was crippled by an ulcer on the hand. Murray said he was a straight-out democrat.

George Rivers Walker was at the meeting. Had a pistol that would not shoot. He said he knew nothing of his own knowledge of the cause of the firing.

The coroner's jury, on their oaths, found a verdict that the said Simmons came to his death by a gunshot wound and other wounds received in the riot which occurred at the joint discussion of a political meeting held near Cainhoy, by some person or persons unknown. Nine of the witnesses before the coroner's jury were democrats, only Smith and McKinley were republicans.

HOW CAME THESE ARMS AT CAINHOY.

One of the witnesses at the coroner's inquests growing out of the Cainhoy riot, Mr. W. S. Elfe, a democrat, said no one but himself had a gun at the Brick Church. He took a gun to hunt on the way. "Three or four of us," he said, "were deer-hunting on our way to the meeting; one was a colored man; the others were white men. They all took their guns to the meeting." This was the general custom of the people, white or colored, democrats or republicans.

James H. Montmolin, page 257, said: "The republicans came ten, fifteen, and twenty miles to the meeting, bringing their guns with them, and stacking them at the stand." This was the general practice of all persons living in the country parishes.

At the Cainhoy meeting fewer persons brought arms than usual, because they had been advised not to do so. Those from a distance, uninformed as to the agreement under which the meeting was held, like Mr. Elfe and his democratic companions, followed their usual custom. The republicans who brought guns, arriving at an early hour, deposited their arms in the chimney of the old weather-house, and covered them so that they should not attract attention during the progress of the meeting. It was there that, according to the testimony of Mr. Walker and the democratic chairman of the meeting, Mr. Sanders, the young white men, who had left the democratic side and gone over to the republican position, found them. Hence the riot and its fatal conclusion. Six white men it is said were killed and several severely wounded. No reliable information was received as to the injuries of the colored men, except as to the first man who was killed.

A careful review of the testimony on all sides, in this case, proves conclusively that at a moment when perfect order existed at the meeting, when all persons, white or colored, were occupied listening in breathless silence, with serious and eager attention, inconsiderate or mischievous young men of the democratic party, after consultation with at least one of its leaders, [Mr. Walker,] by imprudent, if not criminal, conduct, brought on a collision between excited partisans of different races that terminated with the slaughter of innocent and unoffending persons of both parties and races. However much the occasion and its consequences are to be regretted, the responsibility cannot be charged upon the republicans. They were engaged in the exercise of a public right and duty, according to their usual custom, seeking no intercourse or co-operation with democrats, and yielding only to the earnest solicitations of their leaders to be permitted, for the advantage of the democratic party, to participate in the discussion, upon equal terms with republicans, of the important issues of the presidential canvass.

The judgment of every impartial and just man must concur in the conclusion and declaration made under oath, by Mr. Samuel Sanders, the democratic chairman of the Cainhoy meeting, before the coroner's inquest the day after the tragedy: "Witness does not believe that this riot was a premeditated affair of either party, but that it was brought about by the young men already spoken of seizing the colored men's guns in the building."

REPORT OF UNITED STATES MARSHAL UPON RIOT OF CAINHOY.

Mr. Robert M. Wallace, the United States marshal for the district of South Carolina, a native-born citizen of the State, whose official duty it was to keep the peace within the district, was requested by the high sheriff of the county, as soon as the news of the riot reached the city of Charleston, to call for the assistance of the Federal troops to prevent further fighting. In pursuance of this call, which was regarded as an official request, measures were taken to obtain military assistance, and a company of troops was ordered from Columbia, by General Ruger, to proceed at once to Cainhoy, reporting to the United States marshal at Charleston. The riot occurred Monday, the 16th of October, and the troops arrived at Cainhoy the Thursday following, where they remained until after the election. On the 18th October a report of his action was made to the Attorney-General of the United States, at Washington, with a statement of the facts connected with the riot, so far as they could be obtained from persons who were on the ground at the time it occurred.

His report set forth the grounds upon which he thought it his duty to move in the matter, with his view of the cause, history, and results of the riot. The report was ruled out by the committee, but it is regarded as an important part of the history of the affair, and its conclusions are herewith briefly stated, and the paper in full is appended to this report. The marshal first obtained all the information from democrats and then from republicans, and from affidavits of other persons who were present. The greater part of his information was obtained from democrats. A similar report of the commanding officer of the Federal troops at Charleston, General Hunt, to the Adjutant-General of the Army, concerning the riot of the 8th of November, was received by the committee and ordered to be printed with the testimony.

This was, the marshal says, a legitimate result of the intimidation policy or Mississippi plan, adopted by the democratic party at the opening of the campaign for the purpose of breaking down the republican majorities in that State. The republicans had been disturbed by the appearance of armed men at some of the earlier meetings. The meeting at Cainhoy was largely attended by republicans who were present at the first meeting, but had not attended any of the joint discussions. Their suspicions having been excited by the disorders of the first meetings, they took with them such weapons as they had at their homes, old muskets, shot-guns, and fowling-pieces. No militiamen went with State arms, as democrats have represented. They were informed at the place of meeting of the agreement that no person should bear arms, and directed to deposit their guns away from the grounds. They did so. Some fifteen of the guns were hidden in the old weather-house, about fifty rods from the stand, and others carried across the ravine into the woods.

The first speaker was the democratic candidate for the office of prosecuting attorney, who was followed by W. I. McKinley. He had spoken but a few words when a commotion was observed on the left of the stand, and McKinley said, "Those white men have guns and are going to shoot." The colored men shouted, "The white men have seized our guns," and made a rush for those on the other side of the ravine in the woods. The white men had secretly slipped into the old house, seized the guns, and the first shot fired killed an old colored man about seventy years of age. The colored men soon returned with their guns, attacked the democrats in the old house, and then began to fire upon the democrats, who were armed with pistols generally, and retired toward the boats under a heavy fire. This is substantially the statement of Mr. Wallace. His report is printed at page —, and his testimony at page 250, second part of the general testimony.

INTIMIDATION OF VOTERS.

Several instances were presented by the majority of the committee of what was alleged to be the intimidation of colored democrats by republicans of that race. These allegations were sustained by testimony of various witnesses taken at great length. The limits of this report will not admit an examination of all the cases referred to by them. Two of the most important and best supported by evidence are here briefly referred to. The first is the case of

JAMES GRANT AND PETER LUCAS, (pages 18 and 20.)

Grant and Lucas were colored men who desired to vote the democratic ticket at the Red-Top Church precinct, in Saint Andrew's Parish. Grant voted the independent or conservative ticket at the previous election and the democratic ticket in the late presidential election. After he had voted he left the polls with Simon Bennett, a colored democrat, and a crowd of colored men following. When at some distance from the church he was attacked and severely beaten. This, it was alleged by himself and other witnesses, was because he was a democrat. Lucas was a colored democrat who had voted the democratic ticket since 1868, eight years. He went to the polls at the late election at nine o'clock and voted at quarter after nine. He voted the democratic ticket. Leaving the church, he was followed by a crowd and assaulted about fifty yards distant and severely beaten. Later in the day he was again beaten because, it was claimed, he had voted the democratic ticket.

The testimony speaks for itself. If all the witnesses lie "they lie like the truth." They are sufficiently numerous to make it wholly improbable that they spoke by concert or agreement. Their story is natural and probable, and in one respect it accords singularly well with the pregnant and important fact of this election. In the fight between Small and Grant and Small and Lucas, all the witnesses agree that there were enough of the friends of both Grant and Lucas "to fight Small off." The respective crowds must have been at least equally divided in numbers; and if either had an advantage in that respect, it was on the side of the colored democrats, Grant and Lucas. This division could not have been made on political grounds. There were but thirteen or fifteen colored democrats voting at the Red-Top precinct. The enraged partisans must, therefore, have divided upon some other ground, and that was the personal sympathy they might have felt for the contending parties, nearly all of whom must have been of the same political party. There was no panic among them.

The witnesses on the other side were panic-stricken from the moment they reached the polls until they were safely housed at home. They saw everywhere "gorgons and chimeras dire." Even the women that "sold biscuits to the mens" appalled them. Mr. Latham, the proprietor of the phosphate mines, did not dare to challenge a boy who claimed the right to vote. An infant in swaddling clothes, if of the proper color, would have frightened them. April Small was of other stuff. He would fight a republican or a democrat if either called him "a disgraced name—a thief—and he was willing to die for his ticket. He didn't know how other republicans felt about it; he could only speak for himself." It is not difficult to find the truth in this case, and we rest the decision upon the testimony.

Several witnesses swore strongly that this trouble was wholly on account of politics. Everybody at the polls they said was armed with weapons of different kinds. Militia companies paraded during election day at the church, and a general panic was excited among the democrats, and continued until the polls closed, and some hours later. These were the strongest cases of intimidation that were presented, and were backed up by what appeared to be most positive testimony.

But there was another side to this history, and the testimony was equally conclusive. The first witness called was the precinct chairman of the election that day. His examination-in-chief is given entire, as follows, (page 120.)

JAMES H. ROBERTSON (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. BANKS, (page 101:)

Question. What precinct do you vote at?
Answer. I vote at the Red-Top Church, in Saint Andrew's Parish.
Q. Did you have anything to do with the election in this State this year?
A. I did, sir.
Q. Are you a republican?
A. I am a republican by principle.
Q. Did you hold any position?
A. I was precinct chairman for the republican party in Saint Andrew's Parish.
Q. What was the character of the election as regards order and decorum?
A. Very good. I was there from the dawn of day until, I suppose, between the hours of seven and eight, or eight and nine o'clock. So far as that part was concerned, I had the papers, and I was interested in the election, and I staid right about the polls. I didn't come away from the polls. There was loud talking, &c., going on, and at one time I did hear a controversy between two men. I understood that they were quarreling about a check or something, and I told them not to make any noise around the door, and they went away.
Q. Were there any people armed there, and, if so, how many, and what were the arms?
A. There were no persons armed, except in this way: I saw no ammunition. I saw persons with home-pieces, such as they carry to shoot bears with. There were no guns there at all. In fact, I went with Mr. J. D. Murphy to the door, and asked him to show me anything of that kind, if he saw it.
Q. Did you see revolvers?
A. There was only two pistols that I saw there in the course of the day. Murphy had one and I had one. I had mine out and showed it to him to let him see that it could not possibly be used, because it was broken.
Q. Who was Mr. Murphy?
A. He was an interested party on the democratic part there; as spectator only.
Q. Were there people there who had clubs, and, if so, what sort of clubs were they?

A. I saw no clubs except what the people termed walking-sticks. They cut walking-sticks, such as you see people come in from the country walking with.
Q. Where were they cut?
A. In the woods.
Q. What sort of sticks did these people cut?
A. Sticks about an inch through, just the length for a man to walk with.
Q. Were there any women about there?
A. There were.
Q. Were they armed in any way?
A. There was not one on the ground armed in any way that I saw.
Q. You felt interested, as chairman of the committee, to see what was going on?
A. I did, sir; and also pledged myself to keep order in every way.
Q. In regard to this controversy that you heard between two men, of which you have spoken, will you tell us who those men were?
A. One of the parties I was not acquainted with; they all lived up there, and I have often seen him before; his name was James Grant. April Small was another man, a man that belongs to our company.
Q. What is your company?
A. The militia company.
Q. Was the militia company on parade that day?
A. They wasn't; they came there as citizens.
Q. Tell us about this dispute between Small and the man you did not know, and what time in the morning it was?
A. It was between eight and nine o'clock. I heard them talking, and I went up to where they was and told them if anything occurred in the way of violence, or riot, that our work would be of no avail, and that our attempt would be lost for nothing, that all our energies would be for nothing. They were quarreling about a check, and I begged them to disperse from the place, and they did.
Q. What was the check about?
A. I didn't see it. I don't know anything about them kind of checks. I heard them say "phosphate checks." I never seen one of them, and I don't know anything about it. I heard Small saying, "You accused me of stealing that phosphate check," and I don't know anything more about it.
Q. Did they go away?
A. They went off at my command.
Q. Did you see any trouble, or do you know of any trouble, of your own knowledge, between those two men afterward at any time in the day?
A. I didn't, sir. Mr. Murphy, Captain Latham, and others said to me that they heard that they had beat James Grant, and asked me if it was so; and I says, "Mr. Murphy, if it is so, it is beyond my knowledge."
Q. There was no quarrel or fight between them on the ground at the poll?
A. No, sir; never.
Q. At this poll was there more disturbance or less disturbance and confusion than occurs ordinarily at polls?
A. We all concluded that it was the most peaceable election we had ever seen since the war was over.
Q. Do you know whether anybody was prevented from voting by violence; did you hear any complaint of that kind?
A. There was no one prevented from voting as they chose. They went in and voted just as they chose. Of course, there was talk among both parties. Some republicans said democrats shouldn't vote; some democrats said republicans shouldn't vote; but, nevertheless, they went in and voted.
Q. Was the conversation you heard outside of the building very violent?
A. It was just as usually occurs at such places.

JAMES H. ROBERTSON (colored) recalled, (page 107.)

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. You said you were discharged by the railroad company?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. How long did you say you had been employed by the company?
A. I suppose about eight or nine years.
Q. Why were you discharged?
A. Well, sir, Mr. Boylston and Mr. Gadsden told me that I could not support the democratic party they would have to put some one else in my place.

Q. How long have you lived there?
A. I have been living there, now, sir, about six years.
Q. What is your business?
A. I am a farmer.
Q. Do you own your own land?
A. Not yet, sir.
A. You are working on a plantation?
A. Yes, sir; a little farm there.
Q. Where do you vote?
A. I vote at the Red-Top church, in Saint Andrew's Parish.
Q. Were you there at the last presidential election?
A. I was, sir.
Q. Did you hold any office or have any particular duty to perform
A. I was appointed a deputy United States marshal.
Q. Let me ask you, then, if your were about there all day?
A. All day, sir.
Q. What time did you arrive?
A. I arrived there a little before six o'clock in the morning?

A. No, sir; I was there all day.
Q. Did you take notice of what was going on?
A. I did, sir.
Q. State to the gentlemen of the committee how it was during the day regarding order and peace; whether there was any riot or general disturbance.
A. It was quite noisy all day until about half past nine or ten o'clock in the day. I heard a little contradiction between Small and James Grant, something that he was saying about the stealing of a phosphate-check. I didn't even wait for any further conversation from them, seeing they was very near the poll. I went up to them and I said, "Gentlemen, I want you to understand that I am appointed here as marshal, to see justice and peace around this poll to-day, and I ask you not to have any disturbance or fuss around this poll, and those that haven't any business here must disperse and go home;" and then they walked off, and I went and turned my back and stood upon the step. Afterward I heard that there was some trouble.
Q. Was there anything said about voting between Grant and Small?
A. Not a word that I heard on that day; nothing except what Captain Latham said to me, that they was after Grant about his voting. I said, "No, that was not what the fellow was after."
Q. In regard to the general behavior of the people in and out, tell us how it was.
A. Well they were quite quiet, only when they came up some of them was talking and talking, and saying some was a democrat and some a republican.
Q. Was any man prevented from voting on either side?
A. Not a living man, sir.
Q. Did you observe that the people were armed?
A. Yes, sir; I did.
Q. What did you see?
A. The first thing in the morning, after the people gathered there pretty thick, I saw one or two men that had their guns—I believe one double-barrel gun and an old musket—and I said to them same two men, as I thought it was part of my business, that they must carry their guns away just as quick as they could; and I seen one man deposit his gun in the hands of another man till he was done voting. After he was done voting he took his gun and went off down the road.
Q. Was there any militia company about there during the day on parade?
A. No, sir; no parade at all.
Q. Do you know anything about the militia company in that neighborhood?
A. I am an officer in that militia.
Q. What is your rank as an officer?
A. Second lieutenant.
Q. Was there any order for them to parade that day?
A. No, sir.
Q. And you didn't parade?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was there any music, drums, or anything of that sort?
A. I believe there was some boys with an old drum out there, but it didn't make any disturbance; the people were not paying any attention to it at all, sir.
Q. How long have you been a voter?
A. The first time I voted was about eight years ago.
Q. You have been at other elections besides this?
A. I have, sir.
Q. Will you tell the committee how this compared, in the behavior of the people as to order or disorder, with what you have seen before?
A. In my judgment, sir, this has been the quietest election we have ever had, as far as I have ever seen.

SAMUEL FISHBURNE (colored) sworn and examined, (page 107.)

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. On Mrs. Mills's plantation, in Saint Andrew's Parish.
Q. How old are you?
A. Twenty-four years of age.
Q. How long have you lived in Saint Andrew's Parish.
A. I was born and raised there.
Q. What is your business?
A. Planting.
Q. Where do you vote?
A. At Red-Top Church precinct.
Q. Were you there at the last presidential election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What time did you get there?
A. I got there in the morning about half past six o'clock.
Q. Were you there all day?
A. Yes, sir; all day, until the polls closed.
Q. Will you tell the gentlemen of the committee if you saw any disturbance there during the day, and, if so, what it was?
A. A little disturbance commenced in the morning about half past nine o'clock. This was light talking. After that they went up the road. The marshal asked them to go up the road from the polls. Mr. Jeems Grant accused Abram Small of stealing a phosphate check. So when they went up the road Grant said to Abram Small, "You have taken my phosphate check," and Small said, "No, sir; I have no phosphate check that belongs to you," and with that Grant drew his revolver to shoot Small.
Q. Where was this?
A. It was a mile from the polls.
Q. Where were they when you first heard the conversation? Had they gone off this distance from the polls?
A. Yes, sir; and then after that, as I afore said, Grant drew his pistol to shoot Small, and the cap snapped, and Small did not have anything but a little cane stick about an inch large. After that Small threw him down. After that the boys ran up and whipped Small off of Grant.
Q. What happened when these men went in?
A. When these men went in some of the other men went in and parted them. That is all I saw of the row. As for there being any row around the polls, they did not have any at all.
Q. Did you see any military company at the polls?
A. No, sir; there was no such thing.
Q. Did you belong to the militia company?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see anybody who belonged to the militia company who had a musket?
A. Yes, sir; but they laid them all to one side of the drays before they went up to vote. There was an old dray there with some hay on it, and they laid them under that.
Q. How many muskets were there there?
A. I saw two of them.
Q. How many times have you voted?
A. Once; this is the first time.

a mile from the polls, and I asked him how about his accusing me about the check, and before he gave me any satisfaction he hauled out his pistol and made fire at me, and the cap snapped, and the same time as the cap snapped I had a small walking-stick in my hand, and I struck him in the head with it.

Q. How large was the stick?

A. It was a small oak stick, about an inch thick. Then me and him got into a fight, and we bind one another, and I threw him down, and at the same time his crowd ran up and grabbed me; then my party of boys had to run up for to help me; then, at the same time, this man Peter Lucas, he was one of James Grant's party, and he came up and stroke me across my shoulders with a club about an inch thick; after he stroked me with the club I went at him, and me and him got into a fuss.

Q. At the same place?

A. No, sir; at the next place.

Q. What happened after Lucas struck you?

A. When Lucas stroke me where Grant was?

Q. Yes.

A. After the fuss between me and Grant we parted, and I went off.

Q. Where did you go to?

A. I went off up to the polls, and me and Grant did not have any more fuss, and me and Peter Lucas got into a fuss about his stroking me.

Q. Where did you see Lucas afterward?

A. I never seen Lucas for about an hour and a half after me and Grant got through. When I seen him I was gwine up the road home, and I and him had a fuss.

Q. Well, what happened when you met Lucas?

A. Then we started a fight right there in the road, and the folks came up again and parted us. And after the folks parted us I went on home. That is all I know about it.

A. There wasn't but one. He had it in his pocket, and he said I was the one that stole it from him.

Q. Did all the colored people carry sticks or clubs?

A. No, sir.

Q. Yes.

A. No, sir; I went on home.

Q. What time was it that you and Lucas had this trouble?

A. Between two and three o'clock.

Q. Do you belong to the militia company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was the militia company parading that day?

A. No, sir.

Q. There was no order for a meeting of the company that day?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any of the militia company there with muskets?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any muskets or arms on the ground?

A. No, sir; I did not see any, but some folks that stood close around there had a few old guns, but they did not carry them to the polls.

By Mr. COCHRANE:

Q. What ticket did Grant vote?

A. I couldn't tell you what ticket he voted; I don't know whether he voted the democrat or republican ticket.

Q. Were you in the church when he voted?

A. No, sir.

Q. What ticket did the colored people tell you he voted?

A. They didn't tell me what ticket he voted.

Q. Do you mean to say that the colored people did not tell you what ticket he voted?

A. No, sir; because I had nothing to do with it: all I had to do was to put my ticket in, and I have nothing else to do with anybody else's business.

Q. But you followed Grant down the road?

A. Yes, because he called me a disgraced name; he called me a thief.

Q. When you got through with this fuss you went back to the polls?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. Suppose a republican had called you a thief, would you have been satisfied with it?

ARCHIE MANIGAULT (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. BANKS:

A. After we got there and they commenced to fight, the marshal went there to put a stop to it; but I didn't go there right off where the fight was. I thought the marshal had stopped the fuss, and some one called on me to tell me it was best to put a voice in there to stop the fuss. So I went up and hollered after them and told them to stop this fuss, and for all the mens and womens to leave and go back down the road, and get through voting and go back home; and they all fell back from where the fuss was, and voted and went home.

A. No, sir; I don't know what he was.

LABOR STRIKE.

There was another alleged case of "intimidation" for political purposes that is entitled to consideration. It occurred in Colleton County, on the Combahee River. A rice-planter was the sufferer. Mr. J. B. Bissell's manifold afflictions are printed on page 85 of the second part of the testimony, as viewed by himself. He had eight plantations, and employed eight hundred negroes. "The republican negroes were outspoken," he said, "they would not allow a democratic negro to vote at the polls." They were willing and ready to "murder them, on account of their politics." They did whip them. Twenty-five of the negroes who had joined the democratic club in Colleton County were whipped for this reason. He had the proof with him—the best proof—"the whipped negroes themselves." He not only had the negroes, but he had what was better, a photograph—"a likeness of one taken just after he was whipped." He did intend to send it to Frank Leslie's to show the condition of political affairs in South Carolina, but he did not. The negro was produced and he outdid his likeness. The photograph could not falsify the facts. He admitted—Mr. Tony Coker was his name—that he had been whipped, about fifteen miles from home.

"The Dr."—Bissell—he said "had sent up to Hendersonville to get men to cut rice. The colored people down there"—at Colleton—"wouldn't let any of the rest of them work; the doctor sent up for all the democrats to come down." Nine went down, Coker, his son, three other colored men, and four white men, "all democrats but two." Four of these men were whipped—himself, his son, Alonso Ellison, and Moses Desseaux. The two last were radicals and they did not whip them so much. The rest ran away. The crowd that did the whipping numbered about one hundred and seventy men and women. They were mostly republicans. "One out of eleven might have been a democrat." They said, "No damn democrat should come down there to work; that they didn't get enough to cut that rice, and no democrat should come there to cut it; that they planted the rice and they would cut it," (page 91.) Coker said he had been a democrat ever since 1865, all his life, and he gloried in it. He had voted the democratic ticket every year since 1865, and had never had any trouble before. "Their talk about the democratic ticket didn't alarm him, because he had always voted the democratic ticket before."
Richard Coker, the son, says (p. 95) he got twenty-five lashes. "They whipped Alonzo Elliott. He was a democrat." "They whipped Tobe Desseaux. He was a radical. They whipped him because he went into the field to work with us. They told him the rice was theirs, and nobody should go there to work, and they drove him off. They says, 'We have a rule to work at;' that their rule was a dollar and a half an acre. I told them every man was free to work where he pleased; I was satisfied with fifty cents a day myself."

By Mr. BANKS, (page 96:)

Question. Had you heard anything about a strike on the plantation before that?
Answer. They said that they had stopped striking.
Q. Had they gone to work?
A. The strikers?
Q. Yes.
A. No, sir; they hadn't gone.
Q. Well, then, the strike had not stopped?
A. It hadn't stopped then.
Q. Well, what did they strike for?
A. They struck for higher wages.
Q. Well, how much did they get when they were at work before they struck?
A. Fifty cents a day.
Q. Fifty cents a day, and they struck for higher wages?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you got $2 a day?
A. I got $2 a day.
Q. How did you know that they got fifty cents a day?
A. They said so themselves.
Q. Did they say so at the time of the whipping?
A. They said, "I have been working for fifty cents a day, but I am striking now for higher wages."
Q. How much did they strike for?
A. A dollar and a half a day.
Q. Did they get it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did they go to work?
A. Yes, sir; they went to work afterward.
Q. How long did they work?
A. They worked until the harvest was up.
Q. Are you sure of that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. All of these people that were in the crowd that whipped you and your father worked?
A. So they said, but I don't know whether they worked or not.
Q. Then the trouble was about the price?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And then you do not know, only what they told you, how much they had; and they told you they worked for fifty cents?
A. Yes, sir; they told me that, and that they were striking for higher wages.
Q. Were these full-grown men?
A. Yes, sir; womens, mens, and some childrens.
Q. Did the full-grown men work for fifty cents a day in that neighborhood?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you got $2?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How would it be that they would work for fifty cents a day and you got $2?
A. That was before the strike; that is what they told me when they had me up whipping me.
Q. Who was the leader of the strikers?
A. That same man I was telling you about.
Q. Wineglass was the leader?
A. Him and a man by the name of Joe Butler.
Q. Who was Hamilton?
A. He was the man who took them away from me.
Q. Where did he belong?
A. He came from Ashepoo.
Q. Did you vote this year?
A. Yes, sir; I voted.
Q. Did you vote the democratic ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where did they whip you?
A. They whipped me all about.
Q. At what place?
A. At Combahee Ferry.
Q. Who whipped you?
A. Some strikers done it.
Q. How many were there there?
A. There were about ten whipped me.
Q. What day was that?
A. That was on the 19th of September.
Q. That was the day your father was whipped?
A. The same day, sir.
Q. You had not voted then?
A. No, sir; I hadn't voted then.

By Mr. JONES:

Q. You said awhile ago that they whipped you for voting?
A. I didn't mean to say that.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. Well, did anybody trouble you when you were voting?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were there any colored democrats that voted?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did they have any trouble?
A. Not there, sir.
Q. You had trouble when you came into the field that these men sowed?
A. Yes.
Q. When you were out of that you had no trouble?

A. They never bothered me when I was out, and they said I must keep away from the field.

This is the statement of the witnesses introduced to prove violent assaults upon themselves because of their political opinions; they lived fifteen miles from the rice plantations. The people who had planted the rice and thought they were entitled to the job of cutting it, were working for fifty cents a task—that is, cutting one acre. They struck through the county for higher wages. They demanded a dollar and a half a task. The planters sent into the country for men to underwork them, and they were driven away from the fields. They had no trouble about voting; other colored democrats voted and had no trouble. They had trouble when they came into the field. When they were out of that they had no trouble. "They never bothered me," Coker says, "when I was out, and they said I must keep away from the field." (Page 97.)

Now, the facts are that the working people were paid by Bissell fifty cents an acre for cutting rice. They received for their labor checks signed by Bissell, payable in 1880, which might be previously redeemed at Bissell's store for Bissell's goods at Bissell's prices. They refused to work longer for such checks or for such wages. They asked one dollar and a half for cutting an acre of rice, and demanded pay in money. Bissell called in a rifle club, which was composed, the people said, of rebel officers and soldiers, to drive them back into the field, to work at the old prices, for checks payable in 1880, in store goods, and they resisted. Bissell then sent into the country for men who would work for his prices, republicans or democrats, it made no difference to him. And the working people, republicans and democrats, as Coker says they were, who was whipped, drove from the fields of rice they had planted the republicans and the democrats alike who were underworking them. This is the case and these are the facts; and this history is brought up to the House of Representatives as a proof of political intimidation.

The testimony of Hon. ROBERT SMALLS, a member of the House from South Carolina, for whom the planters and the officers of the rifle-club sent to release them from imprisonment in which they were held by one hundred and seventy negro women and men, gives a full history of the whole affair, which is worthy the attention of every member of the House. The genius of Dickens never conceived anything richer or racier than this unvarnished tale of the working people and the planters of South Carolina.

Hon. ROBERT SMALLS (colored) sworn and examined, (page 210.)

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. You are a member of Congress, Mr. SMALLS?
Answer. I am, sir.
Q. From what district?
A. The fifth congressional district.
Q. Are you a member-elect?
A. I am, sir.
Q. Where do you reside?
A. In the town of Beaufort, sir.
Q. How long have you resided there?
A. I was born and have resided there all my life, with the exception of about eleven years' absence, before the war, in Charleston.
Q. What is your age?
A. Thirty-eight the 5th of next April.
Q. Do you know anything about the labor strikes on the rice plantations in Colleton County?
A. Yes, sir, in both Colleton and Beaufort.
Q. Tell us what you know of the strike, if you please, in Colleton County.
A. I went to Colleton County, to Walterborough, to attend a meeting. While attending the meeting, a gentleman came up from what is called Bluesville, which is about twenty miles off. He got up there about twelve o'clock at night with a letter from Captain Elliott—the captain of one of the democratic clubs—asking me to come down to Bluesville at once, stating that they had been penned up in a house for over twelve hours and not allowed to come out to get even a drink of water. At one o'clock the same night myself and Colonel Schaffer, the county treasurer of Walterborough, started for Bluesville in a buggy. Colonel Schaffer was then acting as sheriff, the sheriff being sick. Driving very rapidly, we arrived in Bluesville at a quarter past four o'clock. When I got there, I found between two and three hundred folks all sitting upon the road right in front of Mr. Bissell's store door and gate.

By the CHAIRMAN, (Mr. COCHRANE:)

Q. Colored men?
A. Colored men, boys, and women. As soon as I drove up, the crowd, of course, left the gate and gathered around the buggy. I asked them "What's the matter here? What are you doing here?" They said they had struck for wages, and demanded a dollar and a half an acre for cutting rice; that they had been compelled to work; and they made threats of vengeance; they also stated that they wanted their pay in money and not in checks. I said "Let me see the checks that you are working for," and a large number of them pulled out a quantity of checks signed J. B. Bissell; "I promise to pay John Jones," or whoever the man was, "or bearer under contract —— cents, payable on the 1st day of January, 1880." They said they wanted money and not that kind of a check, and that they could not spend it anywhere else except in Bissell's store. They also said they wanted Remley; that he had beaten one of their men and they intended to get satisfaction. I told them that they had no right to interfere with any man, and that if Mr. Remley had abused one of them their course was to go before a trial justice and take out a warrant for his arrest; that they must not take the law into their own hands, and that if they did they would get themselves into a difficulty in which neither I nor any of their friends could assist them. I told them then to wait, that I would go and see Mr. Elliott, and that they must be perfectly peaceful until I returned to the yard. I then went into Mr. Bissell's yard and into the house, which was situated perhaps a hundred feet from the fence in the rear of the store. There I found Mr. Elliott, with between fifty and sixty white men all armed with sixteen or eighteen shooters; I think they were Winchesters.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. You mean rifles that carried sixteen or eighteen cartridges?
A. Yes, sir; I told Mr. Elliott that I had received his letter and asked him what was the trouble. He said that the deputy sheriff was endeavoring to make an arrest of some parties for whipping their man in the field; that the deputy sheriff had called upon his club as a posse to assist in making the arrest, and that the people resisted the arrest and had driven them up into the store and had had them penned up there for the last twelve hours; that there were four men to be arrested; that they wanted to come out and could not come out, as the women were so violent they were afraid; that these women had sworn to take the life of Mr. Remley. I asked him why they were more violent against Mr. Remley than any of the rest of the men. He said that the deputy could tell better than he could, and pointed me to the deputy, who was in their house, penned up with him, saying, "That is the man who has the warrant for their arrests." I then asked the sheriff what was the difficulty, and he said that he had a warrant for four colored men, and he had taken Mr. Remley along with him to assist in the arrest, and that the people were very violent against him, (Remley.) I asked him if Mr. Remley had struck any of the parties after they were arrested. He said that Mr. Remley and some of the prisoners did have some altercation. I asked him if he still had the warrant for these men's arrest, and he said he had. I told him to come out with me and if these men were in the crowd I would assist him to make the arrest if he was afraid to do it himself. He said he was afraid of his life.

By Mr. JONES:

Q. Had he arrested these men previously, and had they broken away from him?
A. It seems that they had. He said to me that he could not come out unless the club should come out with their arms to protect him. I told him that there was not a particle of danger; that he could come out and arrest every man down there. Then we opened the door and came out, and the club followed out, and they all took a seat in the piazza next to the door. The sheriff and myself went right into the road and into the crowd, and by that time Colonel Schaffer, who was outside, came up, and he called the names of four colored men, and they came out of the crowd, and Schaffer got a cart that was there, put them into it, and he and his deputy sheriff started for Walterborough.

By the CHAIRMAN, (Mr. COCHRANE:)

Q. Who was the deputy?
A. I do not know, sir.
Q. It was not Remley?
A. No, sir. By that time there were two or three women there. One of them was the wife of the man who was said to have been beaten by Remley. She was very violent to Remley, and I told her then she must stop with these threats; and I told the colored people if they had any complaint to make they must go to the trial justice. Then I went back into the yard and told him he could come out into the road. He was afraid to come out, and I told him not to be afraid, that if any one interfered with him I would protect him, even if I had to call upon every man there who belonged to the State militia to do so. At this time the club were all in the yard ordering their horses and refreshing themselves generally. Then Mr. Remley and myself came right out into the road in the crowd. The crowd appeared to have grown to between five and six hundred. I then came out, and the same woman was rather violent in her language toward Mr. Remley. I spoke to the crowd and told them that Mr. Remley was a citizen and had all the rights that they had, and that they had no right to interfere with him; but that if he had outraged a citizen to go and get out a warrant for him; that I was called there for the protection of this crowd and I intended to give it.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. Did they acquiesce in your appeal?
A. Yes, sir; and all the clubs, one by one and two by two, came out and rode off in different directions to their homes.
Q. Were they in carriages or mounted?
A. They were all on horseback.
Q. Did Remley leave?
A. No, sir; he staid there until after twelve o'clock. Very nearly all the men went before he did.
Q. Have you any knowledge or belief that a labor society was organized in this vicinity?
A. I have, sir; I have their constitution.
Q. Will you state what was done by this people?
A. I made it a point to attend one of their meetings on the Beaufort side of the Combahee River. The Combahee River is the dividing line, and the riot was just on that river, on one side or the other. They organized a society not to work for checks, nor to cut rice for less than a dollar and a half an acre, and further not to allow one of their race to work for checks or for less than a dollar and a half an acre.

By Mr. JONES:

Q. They went outside of the society, then, did they?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. What occurred at this meeting?
A. I spoke to them against that clause in their constitution in regard to not allowing any one to work for checks or to cut rice for less than a dollar and a half an acre. I then told them they had no right to interfere with men who might work for any price, that they had a right to organize as many societies as they pleased and to fix the price at whatever price they chose, but that if anybody chose to work for ten cents a day they had no right to take the law into their own hands or to interfere with them in any way. After giving them this advice, about a quarter of twelve o'clock that day they all formed in line and marched away. I told them that inasmuch as they claimed the right to work for high wages other men had the right to work for smaller wages or for nothing, if they pleased; that other men were as free as they were.
Q. Did you return to Beaufort then?
A. Then everybody left the meeting, and I took the train and came on to Charleston.

By the CHAIRMAN, [Mr. COCHRANE:]

Q. Do you know of some colored men being able to cut two acres of rice in a day?
A. I do not to my knowledge.
Q. Do you know of women being able to do it?
A. I only know what I have heard them say themselves. I have never worked on a rice plantation, or had anything to do with one.

By Mr. JONES:

Q. Were these colored men at Bissell's Store a militia company?
A. No, sir; I did not see an arm in the hands of a single individual; they all had short clubs.
Q. You said a while ago in your examination-in-chief that if it was necessary to protect this man Remley you would summon the militia; was there a militia company on the ground?
A. I met men on the ground that belonged to the militia.
Q. Was there a militia company in that parish?
A. Yes, sir; that is the way I came to be sent for. When Captain Fuller's crowd was surrounded in a building about three weeks before, I went and released them in the same way.

Mr. BANKS. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the facts stated by Mr. Smalls in the beginning of his testimony, and which the reporter was directed not to take down; that the people told him that on the previous day Mr. Bissell had had the rifle clubs called out to drive these people back into the field and compel them to work, be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. COCHRANE.) The witness having detailed his conversation with the white men within the building, and having given what they said in reference to occurrences of the previous day, the Chair thinks it but fair that the statement of the colored people, although in his judgment hearsay, should be also admitted, and the same is admitted.

Mr. BANKS. I will not ask for this to be admitted as a charity, but claim it as a right, and I withdraw it on that ground.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COCHRANE.) The testimony will be admitted if desired by General BANKS; the question is not one of charity at all.

Mr. BANKS. Never mind; I will not press it.

Q. (To the witness.) State what you know about the strikes in Beaufort County.
A. I will state that I was on my way to attend a political meeting in Barnwell County. While I was at the depot at Buford, Mr. Davenport, the telegraph-operator, handed me a telegram from Governor Chamberlain, also one from Attorney-General Stone, ordering me to Gardner's Corner, in Beaufort County, to disperse the rioters at that place, and stating if I could not do it without the militia of the State to order them out and disperse the rioters.

By Mr. JONES:

Q. In what capacity were you acting then?

A. I am major-general commanding the militia troops in this section of the State. All the militia troops in Charleston, Colleton, and Beaufort are under my command, five regiments; two in Charleston, one in Colleton, and two in Beaufort. Myself and Lieutenant-Governor Gleaves, who was on the train, got out at Sheldon Station and proceeded to Gardner's Corner. At Sheldon Mill, which is at Gardner's Corners, we found sixty-three armed white men, headed by Captain Elliott, in Mr. Fuller's store, and about a hundred colored men and women outside the gate in the road. We went up and asked them about the same questions: "What are you doing here?" And they replied, "These rebels here are trying to drive us into the field." I went into the yard, and Captain Elliott was sitting on the steps with his rifle in his hand at the back door of the store.

By the CHAIRMAN, (Mr. COCHRANE:)

Q. Is this the same Captain Elliott?

A. The same one; but this affair took place before the affair at Colleton. I asked him what he was doing there, and he said he was summoned there as a posse to assist the sheriff in making arrests. I told him that I did not think it was necessary. I asked him if he was in charge of the men and he said he was. I then handed him my telegram and said, "Read this; I have been ordered here by the governor to make all the arrests that are necessary, and to restore peace," and told him I could do so, and did not need the rifle clubs to assist me in doing it.

By Mr. BANKS:

Q. Did he read the telegram?

A. He read the telegram, sir. By that time, Mr. Sams, the sheriff, came up, and I asked him if he had summoned these men as a posse, and he said no, that he did not; that he could not make arrests with them. Then Mr. Elliott said that he was there to protect Mr. Fuller's property, which was the mill and the store. Then myself and Mr. Sams went out, got a horse, and rode down the road about two miles from Gardner's Corner towards Combahee Ferry, and there we found in the road from two to three hundred colored men and women. In this crowd were the seven men that Mr. Sams had warrants issued for by Mr. Henry Fuller, as trial justice. These men were charged with the whipping of one Bobien, who was accused of working for checks. I went into the crowd, and they seemed to be very furious when we went among them first. I spoke to them and told Mr. Sams to read the names. I told these seven men to answer to their names and hold up their hands as their names were called, and they held up their hands; and I told them to come out of the crowd, and they came out and went to Mr. Sams. Mr. Sams then took them up to Mr. Fuller's office, which was in the same store. Mr. Fuller having gone to Yamasee and the nearest trial justice being fourteen miles distant in Beaufort, they were taken there. Mr. Sams told them to go right on there, and they went in by themselves. The next morning they had a hearing, at which Bobien himself withdrew the charges against them, acknowledging that the whipping was the rule agreed upon in their society; and the trial justice discharged them all. I have got a little ahead of my story. The whole crowd followed me up to Fuller's store, and I invited Mr. Colcock to speak to them and he refused to do so, but stood there and listened to both myself and Governor Gleaves addressing the crowd. When we got through the crowd disbanded and went home.

Q. Do you know whether or not these labor-societies were organized with reference to the laboring people alone?

A. All I know about it is what I have stated before and what they stated to me.

Q. You saw the constitution and read it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything in it about politics?

A. Nothing whatsoever, sir.

Q. Was there anything in it about the interests of the laborers?

A. It was altogether about the labor subject. The constitution was written on a small piece of paper, and read this way: "We shall not cut rice for less than one dollar and a half an acre, nor we shall not work for a check."

Q. And it had no reference to political matters whatever?

A. Nothing that I know of. I never heard that it had before until I heard it in this committee-room to-day.

Q. Was there anything said about politics at the meeting at which you attended and spoke?

A. No, sir; it was completely upon the labor question—the right to strike—and had no reference to interfering with any person as to his vote, or who would work for less than they did.

Q. And in your speech you did not refer to politics?

A. In no shape or form. The week after there was to be a political meeting at Eustace plantation, and I will say that I asked Mr. Fuller and Mr. Colcock if they would not come out and address the meeting. On that day the Charleston News and Courier sent a reporter from Charleston to report the meeting.

Q. Did you hear from Captain Elliott who it was that ordered him to come there and protect Mr. Fuller's property?

A. He said first that he was there on a posse to assist the sheriff; but when the sheriff said that he did not want them, he then said he was there to protect Mr. Fuller's property.

THE BROAD-STREET RIOT, CHARLESTON, NOVEMBER 8, 1876.

The election of the 7th November was a remarkably quiet one in the city and the adjoining precincts. The full republican vote was polled as early as ten or eleven o'clock in the morning. Every voter of both parties was brought out. The election in other parts of the county passed off without disorders of any kind, and gave no occasion for the actual interposition of the troops in any case; but their presence, it is conceded, was productive of beneficial results. General Hunt, who commanded the troops, reported to the Government at Washington that he had visited the voting-places and found everywhere that up to near the close of the day good order prevailed. In the evening one or two noisy partisan crowds gathered at the polls and marched through some of the streets; but as a whole the city was quiet and peaceful through the night. Nothing unusual occurred on Wednesday morning, the 8th November, and the troops were ordered to their camp at Summerville. The United States marshal, Mr. Wallace, reported at noon that everything was perfectly quiet. The city authorities made the same report. The principal business-houses, where inquiry was made by the officer in command of the troops, represented the city to be perfectly quiet and peaceful. There were large crowds gathered about the bulletins of the newspaper offices, but nothing was said or done to indicate or cause disturbance.

Dispatches were received indicating the triumph of the democratic party in both State and national elections. More or less excitement occurred, and soon afterward a fight occurred near the Charleston Hotel, but it was soon suppressed by the police, who made some arrests. Later a fight occurred in Broad street, near the News and Courier office, and the troops were recalled. In both cases fire-arms were brought into use. White citizens, with arms, began rapidly to make their appearance. Notice was sent to the officer in command of the Federal troops that the police was unable to suppress the riot, and a force of twenty soldiers were sent, under a competent officer, to clear the streets and disperse the rioters. This was done without difficulty. Assemblages, more or less threatening, gathered in different parts of the city. The mayor, with General Conner, went through the streets together, and directed all persons, white and black, to go to their homes, which was readily and promptly done. The officer in command of the troops, when this was accomplished, proposed to send patrols of soldiers through the streets, to which the mayor objected decidedly, saying he wanted no patrols of soldiers in the streets. The troops then returned to their quarters at the citadel, and the city remained perfectly quiet during the night.

Early the next morning, the 9th November, there was a large meeting of 'longshoremen, or stevedores, who had assembled to enforce some agreement or orders in regard to their work. The men were excited and determined, but no disturbance occurred. At noon the city was quiet, but threatening. The white men were at their business, mostly armed. The colored people had withdrawn to the public buildings, which were places of common resort for them. Persons were seen going to or from their places of business with arms. The rifle clubs were assembled at their armories. The whites and blacks were both armed, and a conflict, which to all parties seemed to be approaching, must have been violent and bloody. Some differences of opinion occurred between the mayor and the officer in command of the troops concerning the policy to be pursued. The mayor telegraphed to Governor Chamberlain that the clubs had assembled, the white people were armed, and the city was in peril. Orders were received by the commanding officer from General Ruger, at Columbia, "to do what was necessary to preserve the peace." The mayor requested the colored people to disperse and repair to their homes and remain quiet, and assured them of protection. General Conner made the same request of the white men, and accompanied his request with the same assurances. All parties were in perfect accord, the city was again perfectly quiet, and the people resumed their ordinary vocations. This ended the riot of the 8th November, 1876.

OTHER FORMS OF COERCION.

The social influences that were largely brought into use during the campaign for the improper control of voters did not admit of proof in the manner in which other forms of coercion were presented. But they were, nevertheless, applied with unflinching severity, and upon the highest as well as the humblest members of society, and upon natives of the State as well as those who became citizens by choice. Cultivated Christian women, for many years communicants of good standing with Christian churches, though recognized when in communion, were constantly disregarded in the most offensive manner when encountered in society by members and pastors of religious congregations to which they belonged. Many instances of this are within the knowledge of members of the committee, but no one desired to receive or produce proof of the facts. Testimony of this character was taken in relation to the religious intercourse of colored people, but not in respect to white persons; but further the inquiry was not proposed. Numerous witnesses were present to show that direct efforts were made to control the political action of citizens by threatening them with loss of employment or the withholding of gratuities, privileges, and courtesies usual between employers and the persons in their employ.

Some cases of this kind are reported, and numerous advertisements of traders of all kinds soliciting patronage on political grounds, but these inquiries were not pressed at length. As an illustration of the spirit that prevailed in the social circles and in the common intercourse of life attention is invited to the testimony of one of the most respectable citizens of Charleston, in a large degree withdrawn from the excitement of political contests, in which his own estimate is expressed, and that of the community at large, as to the standing and character of republicans, or radicals, as their opponents prefer to call them. Mr. Thomas S. Grimké, one of the most respectable citizens of Charleston, having said, "There are no respectable radicals about here," several questions were put to the witness by Mr. BANKS, by the permission of the committee, which are presented with the answers as printed in the second part of the testimony, page ——.

By Mr. BANKS:

Question. Is it a fact that the respectable portion of the radicals or republicans do not attend these meetings?

Answer. There are no respectable radicals about here; that is my opinion.

Q. What is your standard of respectability?

A. The good opinion of all who are held as respectable in this city; that is what makes a man respectable here.

Q. You mean the good opinion of all respectable people?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state to the committee whose opinion is respectable and whose good opinion it is that makes another man respectable?

A. I mean to say that a man must make himself respectable; no man's good opinion can make him respectable.

Q. What class of people do you refer to?

A. Well, such class as is found in all places, in New York City or in other places; I mean to say that such people as you respect at your home we respect here.

Q. You have stated as a fact that the respectable portion of the republican party does not attend these meetings; that there are no respectable people that belong to the radical party; that that portion of the people whose respect gives character or social standing does not confer respectability upon the meeting; now I want to know what class of people it is that has this standing; is that the test of respectability?

A. No, sir; it is the opinion of all men who are striving for decency and honesty, no matter to what party they belong, but the people who are making such a struggle here do not happen to belong to the republican party here.

Q. And is it upon such considerations of respectability that you make large parties of men responsible for such massacres as you have described? Has it anything to do with respectability or want of respectability in society?

A. Well, I should say that education, training, and everything else should be connected with it. In reply to your question I would say that no person who had respect for himself or respect for the community would be a party to such a thing as that; that is all I mean to say.

Q. Do you know, or do you not know, that such killing of people at political meetings is a common thing in this State?

A. Only by the republicans, or radicals; they have killed the democrats.

Q. You have no means of knowing, or you do not know, that the democrats kill the republicans?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you given attention to it so far as to form a conclusion in your own mind that democrats do not do these things?

A. I have, sir.

Q. And have you determined in your own mind, upon the best knowledge and consideration of the subject, that radicals do kill their opponents?

A. I know they do, sir.

Q. And for political reasons?

A. Nothing else actuates them. These people know nothing about politics or anything else; they do it simply from the hatred that is engendered by these people that stir them up. They are made to believe that they would be placed in slavery if the democrats should succeed here.

Q. As it is a question of great import to the people of the United States, and to solve which by the direction of one of the Houses of Congress we are sent here to make inquiry from what source these crimes proceed which threaten the destruction of the Government, will you state what a radical is; what is the condition of mind which makes a radical, where a massacre of this kind can be an affair of ordinary experience?

A. It is simply this: that they are willing to sacrifice everything both in the State and in the country to accomplish their ends, which is nothing less than holding office and getting money. That is my definition of a radical.

Q. Is seeking office a necessary part?

A. Well, they seem to do it all the time; they all do it.

Q. What proportion of the people of the city of Charleston and South Carolina entertain this opinion that you entertain with regard to the radicals?

A. That is the general opinion in this community and in all communities.

CONCLUSION.

This is a brief statement of the principal events connected with the presidential canvass of the last year in South Carolina. It is intended as a narrative of facts rather than a judgment upon the motives of the parties engaged therein. It was a contest for supremacy between different races of men, representing different interests and aspirations. The contest has been so close and so determined that neither of the contestants can be said to have gained a complete triumph, and an indefinite prolongation of the struggle would probably end in the disappointment and possibly in the destruction of the best interests of both parties. The result shows that there must at some time be a reconciliation of these conflicting interests. How it can be effected it is not easy to say. Possibly it may come through a better acquaintance with the capacities and characters of those engaged and a clearer and wiser estimate of the solemn duties of citizens and the vital necessities of the State.

The immediate and most important purpose that animated the white people or democrats, as against the colored people or republicans, was to diminish the great preponderance of republican majorities in the city and county of Charleston and other counties of the seaboard section of the State. The republican majority of 8,000 votes in the city and county of Charleston, if maintained, would probably give to the candidates of that party in the State, and possibly in the Union, a new lease of power. The reduction of that majority in the county to 2,500, as the democrats hoped, would have re-established their party in power in the State and might give them the control of the General Government. It was to secure this result that the measures adopted and the candidates at the convention were directed. The failure was a signal one. The republicans maintained their numerical and political strength at every point. The democratic orators made no converts at the meetings for joint discussion. Proscription produced no effect upon laborers. Intimidation proved worthless, considered as an intimidator merely, and good for nothing for any other purpose. The organization of rifle clubs was counterbalanced by detachments of Federal troops. The purchase of party leaders did not diminish the strength of the rank and file. The introduction of revolvers and rifles at political meeting produced no panic; and, where the equality of numbers permitted it, it was found, to the utter astonishment of the best-informed persons, that colored men could fight white men, and republicans stand their ground in any form of contest against democrats.

The campaign projected with so much careful study and supported by such astute counsel from other States proved a total failure. Every expectation was disappointed, every promise repudiated, every appeal disregarded, every bribe rejected, and every threat defied. Amid the wreck of so many sanguine hopes, it was difficult to account for such failure. The cause was at length discovered. It was a duplicate or triplicate treachery that defeated them. Negro deception, intimidation, and Federal invasion, for which they had not been prepared, had done the work. Men who had promised to vote for them did not do it. Persons of wholly inferior position and character, who were expected to yield to menace and violence, not only confronted their opponents, but resisted and defeated them; and the last card—one which had been played with so much success in adjoining States, upon which in fact every expectation of success depended—the shot-gun and rifle—that had been carefully dealt out, according to the rules of the game as practiced in the best political society, to each member of the clubs organized for intellectual and social pleasures only—was, as they say, unexpectedly and scandalously trumped by a Federal bayonet.

There was one other method that might have been tried, which was, in fact, approved by a large majority of the people most interested in the result of this struggle and in the restoration of justice, peace, and prosperity, but which was not acceptable to some persons that assumed to control the direction of affairs they wanted to: the union of moderate men, the recognition of constitutional obligations which everybody had sworn to perform, and the guarantee to others of the same rights which they themselves enjoyed. But this was not approved. "It was caviare to the" generals. The result was that the popular vote, very much to the surprise of some of the committee of the House, was found to have given a clear, unquestioned majority for the republican electoral ticket, and, as the undersigned believes, would have given and did give, when purged of the processes and results of violence, and restricted, as it ought to be, to the ballot of the citizens of the State, for the republican State ticket a majority sufficient for all useful purposes.

In truth the democratic party of South Carolina is a minority of the people, and there is no just method known to modern governments by which we can expect or even hope, in the long run, to make a minor equal to a major number. Would it not be better, after so many fiascos, so much bitter disappointment, so many battles fought, so much blood sacrificed, so many "good tall fellows destroyed," to try another method in which there may be more justice than violence, more amenity than insolence, more truth than falsehood, and more of desert than demand? Ideas are better than blows, brains better than blood. Success, to be assured, must be deserved; laws, to be obeyed, must be equitable; counsel, to be serviceable, must be sound; and authority, to be respected, must represent a higher power than him that uses it. Men that are indifferent to the preservation of governments ought to think of the sacrifices that have been made to create them.

Tantæ molis erat Romanum condere gentem.

"How much rude labor it cost to build imperial Rome."

There are no people that have less of the consideration of mankind than those that inherit liberty and lose it. South Carolina is less dependent on her own strength than on the general judgment of men; and in that eternal court where detectives are not judges, and counselors not confederates, and jurors are not idiots, upon her present record she must stand condemned. Her policy is provincial and vulgar; her ambition sullen, sordid, and degenerate; and her theory of duty trifling, temporary, and time-serving. There is nothing in the position or purposes of the superior race that challenges sympathy or commands respect; nothing in the measures they propose that promises peace to the people or security and rest to the Republic; nothing in the legislation they recommend or the theory of government they advocate that inspires or promotes the spirit and power that Lord Bacon attributes to every code of just laws and every administration of wise men. "OUR LAWS ARE DEEP, NOT VULGAR; NOT PROMPTED BY THE SPUR OF A PARTICULAR OCCASION FOR THE PRESENT, BUT OUT OF PROVIDENCE FOR THE FUTURE, THAT THE ESTATE OF THE PEOPLE MAY BE MORE AND MORE WISE AFTER THE MANNER OF LEGISLATORS IN ANCIENT AND HEROICAL TIMES."

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. A. T. WALLING,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877.

The House having under consideration the electoral vote of Wisconsin—

Mr. WALLING said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the ten minutes allotted to me to close the debate on the last State to which objection can be made, I do not intend to discuss the proposition contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] as that has been fully done by the honorable gentleman himself, but I desire first to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication I have received from the city of New York since the gentleman from that city [Mr. WOOD] has become the leader of the republican party on this floor, [laughter,] to show that not all, at least, of the business men of that city, the men who are interested in this contest, have agreed to this transfer of the democracy to the other party to save their ducats.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, February 26, 1877.

DEAR SIR: We wish to indorse the request made by Peter Duffy, of Perry County, Ohio, that you "Thwart the thieves at all hazards," and prevent the outrageous counting in of a usurper as President. We consider it the duty of every American citizen to himself, and above all to his country, to use every effort to prevent such a result.

With great respect, yours, &c.,

Hon. A. T. WALLING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WALLING. As a further part of my remarks, I send up two telegraphic dispatches which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Dated Philadelphia, November 10, 1876. Received at Washington, D. C., November 10, 1876, 2.16 p. m.]

To Gen. W. T. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Instruct General Augur in Louisiana and General Ruger in Florida to be vigilant with the force at their command, to preserve peace and good order, and to see that the proper and legal boards of canvassers are unmolested in the performance of their duties. Should there be any grounds of suspicion of fraudulent counting on either side, it should be reported and denounced at once. No man worthy of the office of President would be willing to hold the office if counted in, placed there by fraud. Either party can afford to be disappointed in the result, but the country cannot afford to have the result tainted by the suspicion of illegal or false returns.

U. S. GRANT.

[Dated Centennial Grounds, Philadelphia, November 10, 1876. Received at War Department, November 10, 1876, 2.12 p. m.]

General SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Send all the troops to General Augur he may deem necessary to insure entire quiet and a peaceable count of the ballots actually cast. They may be taken from South Carolina unless there is reason to suspect an outbreak there. The presence of citizens from other States, I understand, is requested in Louisiana, to see that the board of canvassers make a fair count of the votes actually cast. It is to be hoped that representatives and fair men of both parties will go.

U. S. GRANT.

Mr. WALLING. I present those telegrams for the purpose of extending the assurance they convey to our southern brethren, who seem to have abandoned the northern and western democracy on this occasion, that all their expectations, all their hopes will be fulfilled. There cannot be a possibility of doubt that if Nicholls is governor of Louisiana, Tilden is President of the United States. Packard received several hundred more votes for governor than did Hayes for President. He was counted in by the same returning board that counted the State for the Hayes electors. If Hayes be President, how much more certainly is Packard governor. To suppose otherwise—to suppose that Hayes can recognize the Nicholls government—is to assume that the President about to be counted in will act as absurdly as a man who having purchased an estate should burn his deed, the only muniments of his title, before the same was recorded.

As for myself I can only say, that I have done all I could; have as I think performed my whole duty in trying to prevent the consummation of what I believe to be a fraud upon the solemnly declared verdict of the American people, committed by a commission appointed under a law of this House, with three judges at its head, who, forgetting the high duty they owed to themselves and to their country and to right and justice, permitted themselves to be made partisans of, and voted in that condition as they would vote at the polls for the election of a constable. I can only say that I disclaim their acts. I was one of those who voted for the bill under protest. I also voted at the election in November last, under the election law of my State which permitted me to vote, but in doing it I did not bind myself not to disclose any frauds in my own State; and in voting for this bill I did it in the full faith that these judges, the highest judicial officers in the land, when evidence of the frauds was tendered to them, would hear the testimony and decide upon it. That would have been becoming their position. I have been disappointed in that, and finally the time has come when a man who has not had a majority of votes, who was defeated by more than one-quarter of a million, is to be counted in by a national returning board through the action of a majority of its members.

Yes, sir, this great wrong will be consummated. A man repudiated by the people will be elevated to the most enviable position on this earth by a national returning board. It may be deemed offensive to speak of the electoral commission as a returning board. I concede that the infamies perpetrated in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida by the men who composed the returning boards in those States have brought the term into merited ill-repute. It has become offensive to all honest men, and is used in ridicule of justice. It is synonymous with mockery. With a full appreciation of the acts which have made the expression disreputable, the electoral commission can be called little else than a national returning board. Wherein has it met the public expectations? Wherein has it sought to discover fraud or unearth villainy? Wherein has it answered the purposes of its creation? What act has it done which justice sanctions or truth approbates? Not one. With a blindness close akin to madness, with obdurate wickedness and intent to perpetrate wrong, step by step it has proceeded to the consummation of a fraud which had its conception in deliberate malice against the laws, the Constitution, and the verdict of the people.

Wherein does its action differ from those of the returning boards of the enslaved States. Has right been more respected or justice more observed? Have the promises which were given in the discussion of the measure which created it been fulfilled? Has the faith which was born of the special pleadings of those republican Senators and Congressmen who urged the adoption of what they were pleased to term the great measure of pacification been kept? No, sir; the promises were delusive. The faith has been violated. As I walked through the Rotunda to-day I was impressed with the thought that underneath my feet were imprisoned the men who had stolen the vote of a State. Wells and Anderson, Casanave and Kenner, reprobates, so lost to every sense of shame, so guilty of corrupt practices, that their condition brought no sense of degradation to themselves, nor elicited sympathy from those who were reaping and appropriating the fruits of their villainy. One set of men in close confinement; another set using the labors of the former, but not abashed nor dispirited, walking with heads erect, receiving the congratulations of their fellows, while they carried to completeness the venal intents of the wretches who were sighing behind prison bars. What a contrast!

Proceed, as I feel assured you will, to the consummation of this political ravishment. Elevate to the highest office a man who has been repudiated by the people; carry to fruition the most stupendous fraud that has ever amazedthe lovers of freedom and constitutional government, but rest assured of one thing, you will not be permitted to go blameless. To an accountability strict as though the laws of the Medes and Persians did judge your acts will the people hold you. Public opinion, violated and outraged, is righteously incensed, and with pitiless justice will hurl you from the power you have stolen. Do not flatter yourselves that when the people submit to this outrage they also give it sanction. It is true that a most vital thrust has been made at republican institutions. It is not cowardice, however, that will move the people to submission; it is only patience. Rich as have been the baptisms liberty has demanded, it is not improbable that she will demand still more. If her preservation can be secured alone by another libation, the sooner it is contributed the better. Of all the ocean of blood shed in her name not one drop has been wasted. There is no soil so sterile wherein it will not take root. There is no tyranny so secure as to be safe against its influence. There is no corruption which can resist its cleansing power. This land liberty has made her refuge, and here she will remain forever. Her protection and perpetuation are confided to the democracy. The sacred trust is recognized and will be guarded with jealous care. Whatever sacrifices are necessary, they will be made. Whatever demands are exacted, they will be met.

Appropriations.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1877,

On the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the closing hour of the Forty-fourth Congress, a period in which the subject of reform in public expenditure has risen above all other questions, except, during the present session, that of the presidential succession, a brief review of what has been accomplished will not be deemed inappropriate.

In the ordinary course of legislation the eleven great appropriation bills, based upon the estimates of the various Departments and reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations, will embrace all of the necessary expenditure of the Government for the current and succeeding fiscal year, and these, with the miscellaneous and private bills that may be passed, will embrace the entire expenditure authorized by each successive session of Congress. The eleven great bills are those making appropriations in detail for pensions, Post-Office Department, fortifications, consular and diplomatic, legislative, Military Academy, Indian service, deficiencies, naval, sundry civil, and Army, to which occasionally, but not uniformly, has been added a bill prepared by the House Committee on Commerce known as the "river and harbor bill." The House during the present session has declined to pass a bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors, believing in view of the appropriations made at the last session for those purposes the public interests do not require for the present any further appropriation. But in addition to the eleven bills, the expense incident to the contest over the presidential election, expenses of committees of the House and Senate visiting the States of the South, the fees of vast numbers of witnesses called before committees from every section of the Union, the printing of great volumes of testimony and innumerable reports, and the expense incident to the electoral commission, expenses outside of the ordinary expenditure of Government, have occasioned the passage of two bills in addition to the eleven regular appropriation bills, being for deficiencies the present fiscal year, one for expenditure of the House and Senate for $139,254.98 and the other for the public printing, of $350,000.

With this explanation, I present the following table showing the state of each of these bills from the time they were reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations until their final passage and the amount finally appropriated by each, in comparison with the amount appropriated by each corresponding bill at the first session of the present Congress, except as to the Army appropriation bill, which failed to pass.

It will be seen from this table that all of the appropriations of the present session, including the Army appropriation bill, involved appropriations in the aggregate in their various stages, as follows:

As reported to the House	$133,151,498 87
As passed by the House	132,960,564 06
As passed by the Senate	152,793,195 15
As finally passed both Houses, Army bill omitted	117,446,434 81
Amount appropriated by the corresponding bills of last session, including $25,987,167.90 for the Army	148,862,160 48

It is apparent from this statement that if the Army appropriation bill had passed, even appropriating the same sum that was at the last session appropriated for the present fiscal year, namely, $25,987,167.90, the entire appropriations by these bills would have been $143,433,602.71, being $5,428,557.77 less than was appropriated by the corresponding bills and for corresponding purposes in the first session of this Congress, being the current annual expenses of Government.

The miscellaneous appropriations, including the appropriations made by private bills during the first session of this Congress, were large, including several unusual appropriations, such as the $1,500,000 for the centennial exposition; $1,634,700 for an increased number of troops to be employed during the Indian war; $200,000 for the Washington Monument; $200,000 for military posts on the Yellowstone, and the like; and while the miscellaneous appropriations, including those made by private bills, are less this session than for many years past, the miscellaneous appropriations for the two sessions of this Congress, for the reasons above named, exceed the corresponding appropriations made during the Forty-third Congress, as will appear in the table which I will hereafter submit.

The appropriations made by the regular appropriation bills of the last session were only $148,862,160.48, but the miscellaneous and private bills increased that sum to $154,551,039.62, being the entire appropriations of the last session, while the miscellaneous appropriations and private bills of this session do not exceed $700,000, being in the main allowances made ($464,058.13) by the southern claims commission under the act of March 3, 1871, so that the entire sum appropriated for all purposes during this session by all bills, public and private, is $118,128,347.11, and if the Army bill had passed and had even appropriated the same sum that was appropriated last session, namely, $25,987,167.90, the appropriations made this session for all purposes would have been $144,115,515.01, as against $154,551,039.62 made at the last session, and as against $179,166,209.90 made at the preceding session, being the last session of the Forty-third Congress.

During the presidential campaign of last year it was charged that the heavy reductions made in the appropriations during the first session of this Congress were not bona fide reductions in the expenditures of Government, but mere temporary partisan expedients, and that at this session the appropriations for deficiencies would run the aggregate sum up to the former appropriations. To show how groundless this charge was, and because the appropriations made by an entire Congress, the one session before and the other session after the congressional election, is the fairest test of real increase or reduction of expenditure, I have had the following table prepared showing the appropriations made for all purposes during the two sessions of the Forty-third Congress and the two sessions of the present Congress. It has been carefully prepared by a gentleman perfectly familiar with the appropriations for many years. I have examined it carefully and believe it to be perfectly correct. It is made from the official figures in all respects except as to the miscellaneous appropriations of the present session, and these have been carefully examined. I deem this statement proper in view of the very great reduction shown in the appropriations made by this Congress in comparison with those made by the last.

I here present the table:

† Includes $2,362,456.89. Re-appropriations under act of June 20, 1874.

‡ No amount included for Army law for the Forty-fourth Congress, second session.

§ Of the miscellaneous $300,000 is to be re-imbursed from sale of lands belonging to the Pawnee Indians. Act of April 10, 1876.

It will be seen from this table that the appropriations made by the Forty-third Congress, first and second sessions, were in the aggregate $362,851,212.06, while the appropriations made by the present Congress, first and second sessions, not including the Army appropriations for the second session, amount in the aggregate to $272,537,989.59; adding to this sum the Army appropriations on the basis of the appropriations of last session, namely, $25,987,167.90, we have the sum of $298,525,157.49, which would include all of the appropriations required for the coming fiscal year and embrace every appropriation necessary for the administration of the Government; showing in favor of the present Congress as against the last the enormous sum of $64,326,054.57, being a reduction of $32,163,027.28½ for each year of this Congress below the appropriations made for the two years by the preceding Congress.

I may be told that at this session no appropriations have been made for river and harbor improvements. That is true, but it is also true that the lavish appropriations made on pretense of improving rivers and harbors of late years have been a fruitful source of corruption. The sums appropriated for purely local improvements and for the benefit of individuals, for the pretended improvement of unknown creeks and rivulets, and to give gentlemen advantages in political contests, have very greatly exceeded the sums appropriated for works of general importance. While it is proper and within the scope of the constitutional powers of Congress to appropriate money for works of national importance, improving the facilities for the general commerce of the country, it is better that no such appropriations should be made at all than that under their shelter millions should be squandered for individual aggrandizement and in the fraudulent control of political results. During the war and for many years before the war no appropriations for river and harbor improvements were made. After the war, beginning with two millions a year, the lobby, by a most corrupt system of legislative log-rolling, soon ran the appropriations up to $6,600,000, a large portion of which was the spoils of the lobby. Of the five millions appropriated last session less than one-half, under the wise policy of the Chief of Engineers, has been expended; there is, therefore, no possible excuse for appropriating any more at this session. The Army appropriation bill is alone to be taken into the account, the House wisely defeated the other bill and repulsed the corrupt lobby that always gathers around it.

Then, sir, the fact remains that after making every appropriation required for the honest administration of the Government, and after the House, in both sessions of this Congress, in a spirit of compromise, made concession to the views of the Senate as to many millions of dollars in the several Departments, the amount saved to the Treasury in these two years, in comparison with the appropriations made during the two preceding years, is the sum of $64,326,045.57; full appropriations for the Army, even if not reduced in numbers, being taken into the account. The magnitude of this sum is seen when we remember that the sum saved to the people in these two years is equal to the entire annual expenses of the Government seventeen years ago. Many months have elapsed since this system of retrenchment took effect, and it is now perfectly safe to assert that this retrenchment has not in the least degree embarrassed the public work in any department of Government, but has positively promoted the efficiency of the Departments and honesty in their administration; and it is equally safe to assert that large additional retrenchments will greatly promote the same valuable results.

It will be seen by the table I have first submitted that the bills of the present session have made reductions on the appropriations of the last session in every instance except for the Indian service, Navy, and sundry civil. There is a slight increase in the Indian appropriations, growing out of the proposed surrender of the Black Hills country and the removal of the northern Sioux to the Upper Missouri. It was found that until some system can be adopted to reduce the large body of unemployed officers in the Navy, a slight increase over the appropriations made by the last session was inevitable, unless the number of vessels in commission could be reduced and the unsettled condition of affairs in Europe seemed to justify a considerable naval force in the Mediterranean. The slight increase in the sundry civil bill grew out of the increased appropriations for the palatial and extravagant buildings commenced years ago in Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Saint Louis, and for the State, War, and Navy Departments in this city. There was no excuse for commencing most of these great buildings. It was a fraud upon the country to commence any of them upon the extravagant and profligate estimate of expenditure upon which they were commenced. The meretricious and lavish decorations of these buildings, so in contrast with the grand simplicity of our public architecture in former years, and adding immensely to their cost, insult the republican tastes of our people; but they are upon our hands, and a reasonable economy requires their early completion. If the policy of this Congress is adhered to, this lavish source of expenditure will soon be at an end. No new building has been authorized.

While in the three instances I have named there has been a moderate increase of the appropriations in comparison with those of last year, in every other branch of the appropriations large reductions have been made.

In the closing hours of the last session it was predicted by gentlemen in this Hall and in the other end of the Capitol, and repeated on every stump in the country, that the deficiencies appropriated this session would make up for the pretended retrenchment in the last session. We denied this, and the result shows the untruthfulness of the prediction. The deficiencies appropriated for this year are less than for any year since the war. The appropriations for deficiencies during the last session of the Forty-third Congress and for the first and present sessions of this Congress are as follows:

Last session Forty-third Congress, deficiencies	$4,703,699 18
First session Forty-fourth Congress, deficiencies	2,908,177 09
Present session Forty-fourth Congress, deficiencies	2,398,950 53

I must add that these appropriations made the last session and the present session grew out of the difficulty of stopping at once the pernicious practice so long indulged in of granting deficiency appropriations without question; but now, sir, with the full notice given to the Departments, if Congress is true to the country, this vicious system of deficiencies, except in time of war, will cease.

In my comparisons of the appropriations of this session with those of former years I have assumed that the Army appropriations for the next fiscal year, when made, will be the same as the appropriations of the last session, namely, $25,987,167.90. The retrenchment I have shown cannot be affected by this bill when it shall pass, for it is impossible, unless war should intervene—and that no one can possibly contemplate—that the appropriations for the Army should exceed that sum. It is based upon an Army of 25,000 men, while the bill as it passed the House appropriated $21,993,749, and proposed to reduce the Army to 17,000 men, providing that all enlistments should cease until the Army was reduced to that number. Now, while I cannot assert that the bill, when it shall finally pass—for its failure at this session is now inevitable—will only appropriate the $21,993,749, for a compromise between the two Houses will require mutual concessions, I can very safely assert that it will not appropriate more than was appropriated last session.

The bill as it passed the Senate restored the Army to its old number, 25,000 men, and fixed the appropriations at $26,188,870.50, a slight increase on the appropriations of last session. The reduction of the Army is a measure from which the House cannot recede. It may not be reduced to 17,000, but I am confident it will not be kept up to 25,000. Patient as our people have been in view of the employment of the Army to override the civil authority and control elections in the interest of party, it is very clear that under no circumstances will the people peaceably contemplate such a spectacle again. An Army of 17,000 men is all and more than is required for the only purposes for which we require an Army, an organized force around which to rally the volunteer forces—the true army of a republic—in case of public danger, and overawing the savage tribes in the West, keeping them upon their reservations and protecting the borders. The extension of our railroad system into and through the Territories justifies a large reduction of our military. Seventeen thousand men are more than will be legitimately employed; even during the late Sioux Indian war not one-half of the Army was employed west of the Mississippi. It may be said that occasionally and unfortunately some force is necessary to aid even in our cities the revenue officers at times. In my judgment, the civil power is and always has been sufficient for this purpose. I shrink from the thought that our people are to become accustomed to the employment of the military power in the civil affairs of Government; but even if this argument were a good one, we have stationed everywhere upon the eastern coast, well paid and never employed, the marine force, fifteen hundred strong, a larger force than has ever been employed since the war in such a service; not a very martial corps, I admit, but sufficiently so for any civil employment. The Army can be reduced, and it ought to be reduced. An army of volunteers, citizen soldiers, is the only army that should be tolerated in a republic. A people jealous of their liberties cannot contemplate with composure a standing army having no employment except watching the course of civil government.

As a nucleus for a volunteer army in case of public danger and to preserve peace upon our frontiers, and among the Indian tribes, 17,000 men is enough and more than enough, and this heavy item of $25,987,167.90 ought to be and must be reduced. I am very safe in saying it will not be increased whatever may be the temper of the next Congress.

I therefore, sir, feel perfectly safe in saying that when the Army appropriation bill shall pass, the appropriations for the next fiscal year will not exceed in all $144,115,515.01, and the aggregate appropriations for all purposes of the two sessions of the present Congress will not exceed $298,525,157.49 as against $362,851,212.06 made during the two sessions of the preceding Congress.

This showing is encouraging and yet I feel more regret for what we have failed to accomplish than satisfaction with what has been done. It is true that no one could hope to bring down the extravagant and reckless expenditures inspired by the irresponsible period of the war, heavy inflation, and the struggles of a great party to maintain its ascendency at once. Even earnest and honest men at the head of departments could not adapt their service immediately to a frugal and simply necessary expenditure. The army of supernumeraries cannot be disposed of at once. The great army of men valuable in the field of partisan politics, and valuable nowhere else, would for the time hold their own against men simply competent for official duty. Every material retrenchment affects so many men and women accustomed to live off of the public Treasury, with incomes enormously in excess of the compensation paid for similar services in private life, that however necessary and proper it is certain to encounter resolute resistance.

No department ever recommends a reduction of the number of employés or the rate of salaries, but almost uniformly demands in the estimates an increase of both, and the most extraordinary expedients are at times resorted to to increase or retain employés, and especially to increase salaries. No man will ever fully appreciate the power of patronage until he has carefully considered the stubborn resistance with which the party in power meet every measure of retrenchment. I need not say that the sum of $143,433,602.01 exceeds greatly the sum really necessary to meet the proper current expenses of this Government during the coming fiscal year. That is apparent to all men who have examined into the details of our expenditure. A very heavy reduction from that sum would positively and greatly increase the efficiency and integrity of every branch of the public administration.

But retrenchment even to that extent has been effected under the most favorable circumstances. The men in power, it is true, have in the main stubbornly resisted every effort at reform, but the movement that elected this House was a reform movement of unusual earnestness and vigor. It demanded, in view of the prostrate condition then as now of every branch of industry, that searching reforms should be inaugurated and the most positive economy enforced. Thus commissioned and sustained by the general voice, this House has, at least moderately, well executed its trust. But I fear that already the public vigilance is relaxed. I hope I am mistaken, but I am certain that so soon as the general voice shall cease to demand economy in government and the public vigilance shall be withdrawn, Congress and the administrative power will settle back into the old ruts and every session will close, as in the past, with new officers and enlarged salaries.

The fierce struggle for new offices and higher salaries, for new fields of expenditure by which ambitious gentlemen may live and accumulate fortunes out of the labor of their fellow-citizens, can only be resisted by a positive and persistent public sentiment in favor of frugal government. When the public vigilance is relaxed, the pressure upon Congress becomes irresistible.

A civil service reform that adjusts the salaries of officers and employés of the Government to the compensation received by citizens in private employments requiring corresponding attainments and integrity and the utter repudiation of the doctrine that public employments shall be conferred as reward for partisan services, as corrupting and dishonorable, is absolutely necessary if our system of government is to be long maintained. Every successive year makes this the more apparent; with lavish appropriations, which the interest of party is constantly demanding, the patronage of the Federal Government is an almost irresistible power. It is even now the prize that greatly and mainly inspires and intensifies the fierceness, intolerance, and vindictiveness of party spirit. The promise of larger rewards in public than in private employments opens up unworthy and venal motives in the struggle for office, while honorable ambition for public trust and confidence disappears. The decay of public virtue and the prevalence of venal motives in public affairs are the natural outgrowth of lavish expenditure, while the measure of purity in government will be found in the degree of frugality that pervades its administration.

Before our people, sir, can feel that their Government is administered in the interest and for the common benefit of all, and not largely for the benefits of the great army of employés, who, without any just return, live upon the Treasury and take "from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned," the expenses of this Government must be reduced very greatly below the appropriations made even by the present Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in reviewing this work of retrenchment, I would be very unmindful of the agencies by which it has been accomplished if I did not recall the fact that to your inexhaustible industry and thorough knowledge of the wants of the public service, as chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations during the first session of this Congress, the country is very largely indebted for the reforms that have been effected and the millions that have been saved to the Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, in the closing moments of the Forty-fourth Congress it can be safely said that during its existence the lobby has not achieved a single victory. No scheme of public plunder has been successful, no "rebel war claim" has reached the Treasury, no new offices have been created, but a multitude have been abolished; no salaries have been increased, but a large number have been diminished; no new scheme of public expenditure has been inaugurated, while many have been discontinued. The general expenditures have been immensely reduced, promoting the integrity and efficiency of every department; and those partial reforms may at least inspire the hope that the people who bear the burdens of government will see to it that the work of reform shall not falter, that their Government shall no longer be administered in the interest of favored classes or as the mere dispenser of lavish patronage, but for the common and equal benefit of all.

The Electoral Vote of Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. REZIN A. DE BOLT,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in relation to the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. DE BOLT. Mr. Speaker, I gave my voice for the electoral bill because I felt that its passage would bring about a peaceable solution of our presidential difficulty. Prior to and during its discussion the country was in a feverish state of excitement; anxiety and alarm filled the mind of the people; business was depressed; your workshops were silent, commerce stagnant; poverty and destitution were abroad in the land in search of work or bread. Many of the leading and patriotic men, representing all classes, irrespective of party, in all sections of the country assembled in their various commmunities, and in the most forcible terms gave evidence of their alarm and existing distress, indorsed this measure, and demanded of their Representatives to give it their support. To allay this anxiety, to insure peace and fairness in the count, objections to the bill were waived by many who would not otherwise have yielded.

Again, there were thousands who believed that civil war was imminent, and, unless some measure was adopted whereby it could be averted, that bloodshed would surely follow. This feeling was intensified by the concentration of troops and warlike preparations in and around headquarters.

In addition to this, there was a wide-spread feeling throughout the country that a conspiracy existed to count in Hayes at any hazard; and from recent developments we are forced to admit that this feeling was not without foundation. Others were induced to support the measure because they believed that some members of the commission would not be governed by mere partisan feeling, mere party ties, but decide the questions submitted upon purely legal grounds.

The people half expected and were ready to excuse partizan action upon the part of those members taken from the political branch of the Government, but it is with humiliation and shame that they view the action of those members taken from the judiciary, the Supreme Court of the United States, that exalted position, that ought to place men above and beyond the motive that might prompt the action of the aspiring politician. The country looked to them for protection against fraud, outrage, forgery, and perjury; to them they turned from every section with longing eyes and hearts filled with hope and confidence that justice would be done though the heavens should fall.

How has this hope been realized, this confidence sustained? Eight to seven is the reply. Trace the proceeding of this commission from beginning to end, and those numbers rise up before you like Banquo's ghost, and "will not down at the bidding." Even on the trivial question of extending for a few minutes the time of counsel to discuss a matter of the greatest magnitude ever presented to the Ameriean people the same figures appear. Perhaps their appearance in so small a matter can be explained when we understand that this little favor, this mere courtesy, was asked by democratic counsel. If they could not rise above the mere partisan in a matter comparatively so unimportant, tell me not that they did not besmirch their judicial robes with the mud deep down in the cess-pool of party politics.

Ah, sir, the immortal eight may live and be held in high esteem by the administration forced upon us through the most damning frauds and villainy ever perpetrated upon a free people; but methinks that whenever through life they hear that combination of figures mentioned they will turn quickly and involuntarily to see if the blow is not aimed at them. By their action they have legalized fraud and made it respectable.

If an amount of money, however small, had been involved, instead of the success or defeat of a political party, with fraud charged upon the one side, denied upon the other, and an offer to prove the same had been made, does any living man suppose that the immortal eight would have listened to argument for three long, weary days in order to determine whether or not the evidence should be received? They would have answered, "No. Away with your argument! The doctrine has been settled so far back that the mind of man runneth not to the contrary that fraud vitiates every transaction into which it enters. Bring on your witnesses; we will hear the testimony." But when the Chief Executive of the nation is counted in through fraud and alterations of returns; when the electoral vote of a State has been absolutely stolen by political thieves; when five and forty millions of people are about to be robbed of the man of their choice, these judges tell us they cannot hear testimony in regard to it. What a monstrous proposition!

Mr. Speaker, we had reason to hope for something better from the honorable gentlemen from this House, and also from the other end of the Capitol, who were members of that commission. They gave us good words of cheer, of encouragement, ay, almost solemn pledges of honor, during the discussion of this measure, that the commission would sink the partisan into the patriot; they would rise above party ties and decide as becometh judges.

Let me read from a speech made upon the floor of this House:

But it is charged that this commisson is in the end to be made up of seven men who of course will decide for one party and seven men who of course will decide for the other, and who must call in an umpire by lot, and that therefore you are in substance and effect putting the decision of this whole matter upon chance. If this be true, never was a fact so humiliating to the Republic expressed since it was inaugurated. Of the members of our National Assembly, wisest and best selected for the gravest judicial duty ever imposed upon man, under the constraint of this solemn oath can there be found in all this Sodom not ten, not one to obey any other mandate but that of party?

Eight beats seven is the answer.

The gentleman especially repudiates the imputation that the judicial ermine will be soiled by being brought into contact with the questions involved in this case.

Again I quote from his speech:

But I especially repudiate this imputation when it rests upon those members of the commission who are to come from the Supreme Court. It is true there is a possibility of bias arising from old political opinions even there, and this, however minute, the bill seeks to place in exact equilibrium But this small inclination, if any, will in my judgment be overweighted a hundred-fold by the bias pressing them to preserve the dignity, honor, and weight of their judicial office before their countrymen and before posterity. They will not consent by a party division to have themselves or their court go down in history as incapable of the judicial function in the presence of the disturbing elements of partisan desire for power, in regard to the greatest cause ever brought into judgment.

"Not one to obey any other mandate but that of party." Not one "to preserve the dignity, honor, and weight of their judicial office before their countrymen and before posterity."

Now, sir; what is the result of this doctrine? Will it encourage honesty and fairness in elections? No, sir. Let it be understood that this is to be the rule hereafter, and little attention need be paid as to how the people vote, for whom they vote, or what the majority may be; but the effort will be to buy up the returning boards, influence them by any means, fair or foul, it matters not how, only so we obtain the certificate, we are safe, for it is now settled that fraud cannot be inquired into. Shame on such a proposition; it is not, it cannot be the law, and the man, party, or country that indorses it will be held in scorn and contempt by the civilized world.

The Electoral Vote of Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. C. W. MILLIKEN,

OF KENTUCKY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in relation to the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, in the short period allowed me I can but give an idea of my views upon this great question involving the election of a President of the United States. When the bill was presented to the two Houses for their consideration and adoption or rejection, I confess that serious apprehensions crowded themselves upon my mind as to what was the true line of duty to be pursued by me in casting my vote. It was my earnest desire that a peaceful solution of what seemed at that time to be a question freighted with the most fearful consequences should be attained if possible. To reach my duty satisfactorily to myself I sought all the means of information in my reach, and gave them all the powers of thought and deliberation I could command. And while I sought really and earnestly to give the bill the sanction of my support, I found it impossible to do so upon purely constitutional grounds. I was then and am now unable to discover where the authority is found in the Constitution or any part of it authorizing Congress to bring to its assistance or add to its numbers other persons than its own members to ascertain or count the true and lawfully elected electors of the several States.

To my mind, the Senate and House of Representatives, in joint session assembled, have the power, and the duty devolves upon them, and them alone, to count the vote. A power conferred or a duty obligatory upon Congress to be performed by it, as I construe the twelfth amendment, does not carry with it the correlative power or obligations to give to another those conferred or obligatory powers. But without attempting to give my reasons for opposing the measure upon constitutional grounds, for I have not time, the policy, from my political stand-point, was most objectionable.

To me it appeared that the commission would be composed, of necessity, of a majority of republicans. The commissioners selected by the two Houses, in political complexion, were equal, and those designated by the bill of the Supreme Court stood two and two, the fifth, and odd one of the same body, to be selected by these four. In this selection it occurred to me that he, the fifth one, would, as a matter of course, have to be a republican or no choice would be made. And therefore, as a matter of policy alone, I would have opposed the bill, for I am not of those who believe that human nature can divest itself of its prejudices, biases, and partialities. A man on the Supreme Bench is still human nature, however exalted may be that position. Standing within the sound of the crack of the whip of the leaders and officials of his party, as well as within the reach of the public journals of that party, I did not believe that that fifth man could withstand the party pressure that would be brought to bear upon him, supreme judge though he be.

But, sir, I have no word of censure for those who saw proper to differ with me in casting their votes on this question. I believe they acted in the matter with the purest and best motives. I believe that they believed at the time they cast their votes that this commission would go down into the débris of the corruptions, villainies, and frauds that had been perpetrated in the elections in each and all of these States, and extricate truth, justice, right, and honesty from among them, and bring it unstained and untarnished before the two Houses, that equity between man and man, party and party, and State and State might be meted out to every citizen of this Union.

But this had been denied and refused, and those who hoped for the purity of the ballot-box have been willfully and deliberately deceived. The sable mantle worn by some at least is a fit emblem of the conscience it covers; and whatever may be the opinion of some as to their course in this great and vital matter, posterity will learn from its history that this is the darkest day of the American judiciary, nor will the rains of a thousand years wash the stain away.

And, sir, one of the most remarkable features developed in all of this discussion, and the action of the republican members of the commission is their sudden conversion to, and advocacy of, the doctrine of State rights. So tenacious are they at this time, and in this particular crisis, to the doctrine of State rights that they have wholly forgotten and ignored the rights of the people in the several States. I, sir, am as thoroughly satisfied of the reserved rights of the States and the recognition of those rights by our fathers who framed and adopted the Constitution of the United States as I am of the existence of the great God of the universe. And I believe in their absolute sovereignty in all things not reserved by the people or granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, with the firm conviction of these opinions, I am not prepared to believe or assent to the doctrine that the corporal existence of a State is superior and above the vital existence of the people in their aggregate capacity constituting the living, tangible existence of the State or corporate body. Such an idea carries with it, sir, the power of a few villainous and corrupt officials representing a State, to defeat the expressed will of the people of the State, the very object of government itself.

Sir, in conclusion, I beg men of all parties to turn away from partisan stand-points and look these issues squarely in the face. Turn your backs upon fraud, and lift justice, truth, and right from the cess-pool of infamy, corruption, and fraud, that honest government and the purity of the ballot-box may be preserved and transmitted to posterity as pure as it was delivered to us. Remember that our actions will go to posterity and perhaps followed—as we too often do—as a precedent to be repeated rather than as an experiment to be adopted if right or rejected if wrong.

In framing the Federal Government the States and the people of the States gave to the Federal Government the powers of providing the ways and means of electing a Chief Magistrate to preside in that capacity over all the States. The Federal Government in turn demands of the States that they shall appoint electors in their own way for the election of this Chief Magistrate. When the Federal Government conferred this power upon the States and demanded the appointment of electors, is it not the height of fallacious reasoning to suppose that it gave this authority so thoroughly and absolutely that no power was left it to protect itself from fraud? If the Government is powerless to prevent fraud in the election of its officers, then indeed is it a failure and a farce.

If fraud and corruption shall rise superior to truth and justice now, I will not despair, but put my faith in the goodness and purity of God to deliver us from these evil times.

While I voted against the bill creating this commission, and while I believe it to be a fraud and a swindle, having gotton into the snare, I intend in good faith to stand by the result, leaving the future to right the wrongs we now suffer.

Pennsylvania's Vote—The Electoral Commission.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES H. HOPKINS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1877,

On the objections to the vote of one of the presidential electors of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the popular voice of Pennsylvania declared in favor of Governor Hayes. Deeply as I regret that fact, I would be unwilling to stifle that voice in any degree except upon the clear and imperative mandate of the Constitution. I know that our opponents have set examples which would justify us in resorting to any means, no matter how desperate, to secure a party triumph. I know that we have seen two States throttled by highwaymen in the broad daylight of Christian and republican civilization and robbed of their votes; and the crime has found apologists and defenders on the other side of this Chamber. But, sir, I do not propose to learn private virtue or public morality or political expediency in any such school as that.

I am too unwell to argue the question of Mr. Morrell's eligibility or the substitution of Mr. Boggs as a presidential elector. I can only say that I am constrained to believe that the twenty-nine electoral votes of Pennsylvania should be counted for Hayes and Wheeler.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word upon another subject. The electoral bill was passed through this House by deception and trickery, and it is time that we should know and that the country should know upon whom the responsibility, the odium, the infamy should rest.

Letters and telegrams from my constituents urged me to support the bill. So far as there was any expression from those I represent, there was a unanimous and earnest desire that the bill should be passed. Under these circumstances I reluctantly voted for a measure I did not approve. At the same time we were assured by the framers of the bill that the commission to be created under it, would thoroughly and honestly investigate, ascertain, and declare the very truth and justice in each disputed State. Now, sir, some of those who prepared that bill and who thus construed it are serving upon the commission, and upon every opportunity have violated the trust upon which they were chosen.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and I think the chairman of the House committee [Mr. PAYNE] gave us the assurance that the general understanding of those who prepared and presented this bill, both democrats and republicans, was that under its provisions the paper certificates would not be permitted to shut out the truth; that the electoral votes of a State should not be cast in accordance with false and currupt returns; but only as justice unfettered by technicalities should decide. But we have been deceived, shamefully, fatally deceived. The commission have

> "Wriggled in and wriggled out,
> Leaving the people still in doubt,
> Whether the snake that made the track
> Was going South or coming back."

I read in the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] boldly charged duplicity and bad faith upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who served with him upon the select committee which prepared the electoral bill and who now sits upon the commission created by it. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not meet this allegation with his characteristic frankness, but by a weak evasion sought to turn attention to what he considers the foibles of another gentleman. It is true he claims that the bill does not declare that the commission may go behind the returns. But that is a subterfuge. The question is, did Representative Hoar construe the powers and duties of the commission one way in order to secure the passage of the bill; and did Mr. Commissioner Hoar construe it a different way in order to serve the ends of party? Did he "palter in a double sense?" "Did this gentleman, so learned, so honored, and thought to be so fair, aid in the jugglery by which the House was tricked out of its prerogatives and the people out of their choice for President?

We have a right to call upon the other members of the joint committee to know the understanding that committee had of the scope of this bill. It was that understanding which influenced votes and secured the passage of the bill, and each member of the committee owes it to himself and to the House to disclaim an intentional cheat, or deserves to be branded for shameful bad faith to those who confided in his honor.

One of my colleagues [Mr. TOWNSEND] has defended the members of the committee against the charge of duplicity and argues that our side of the House did not understand the bill to give authority to look beyond the certificates and action of the returning boards. And he refers to an amendment to the bill offered by me to confirm his argument. But that is a lame and impotent conclusion. The bill was carefully and, it seems, most craftily drawn. The interpretation put upon it by the Senators from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and by the Representatives from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] and from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD,] as reported to us, was entirely satisfactory. And, notwithstanding it was thought the fullest faith and confidence could be reposed in those gentlemen, there was no certainty that they or any of them would be upon the commission. No one here then supposed either of those gentlemen capable of treachery; no one ever dreamed that under the party lash their convictions of justice and honor would change. But others whose views of the powers about to be given to the commission were not known might become the interpreters of the law, and it was to guide and control such and to compel them, however unwilling, to examine the disputed facts and decide for the right that I proposed the amendment referred to, carrying before the commission all of the testimony taken by the various committees of either House of Congress.

The adoption of that amendment would have spared us the humiliating and disgraceful spectacle of to-day. It would have brought before the commission proof of such monstrous villainy, proof so clear and unquestioned, that itself would have been

A whip in every honest hand
To lash the rascals naked through the world.

Its adoption would have saved the temple of justice from pollution. It would have snatched two States from the grip of their despoilers. It would have spared the chair of state from the hated presence of a usurper; and it would have spared some consciences from the gnawings of remorse. But the failure to pass it did not absolve those gentlemen from the obligations of good faith, which required them as true and honest men to construe the law when presented in the chamber of the Supreme Court precisely as they construed it in the committee-room and in this Hall.

There are those upon the commission of whom nothing just or fair or honest was expected when their party would be injured thereby. But it is due to history that the power of party spirit should be written, that coming generations may see how it pervaded great men's souls, until, like those possessed in earlier ages, they fell down and wallowed in the mire.

Senator MORTON was a member of the joint committee. Here was his construction of the powers it conferred and the duties it imposed:

They are required to find, for example, under that provision, whether the electors were eligible or ineligible as to their qualifications.

This bill requires this commission to find the facts whether these electors were dully appointed. They are not required to find whether they have been duly certified by the State authorities as having been elected. No, sir; but they are required to find the fact were they duly appointed or elected.

In finding the fact as to who was duly elected they are authorized to take into consideration petitions, unsworn evidence, depositions, papers of all kinds, reports, everything that may be put in for the information of Congress. (RECORD, January 23, pages 22, 23.)

What I maintain is that this commission cannot carry out this part of the bill without going behind the returns from a State, and that is what our democratic friends understand by it. (RECORD, January 26, page 99.)

These declarations, followed by his oath to act as a commissioner in executing this law, and that followed by his action as such commissioner, are a fitting commentary upon the fairness and honesty of the tribunal which is counting a defeated man into the Presidency.

Two of the commissioners vigorously opposed the electoral bill, declaring it to be glaringly unconstitutional. But when it became a law they voluntarily and eagerly sought position under it, either to execute a law they deemed absolutely void; or to pervert a law which honor required them to execute. They had hurried before the people as the defenders and eulogists of the infamous returning board of Louisiana; and then with equal haste and equal sincerity solemnly swore that they would "impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission and a true judgment give thereon." With opinions already formed and convictions publicly declared, they swore to act impartially! If not a party to the Louisiana frauds, these men were fully cognizant of them. And we may well stand amazed at their anxiety to occupy positions from which most men, under like circumstances, would have shrunk with an honest fear of even unconscious bias.

Mr. Speaker, the consummation is almost reached. Fraud and force, forgery and perjury have done their work. A great nation, which has just celebrated its centennial anniversary with so much pomp and pride, lies helpless. The Republic, powerful and majestic, cowers before her assassins. Popular government lies bleeding and in chains, while "ballot-stuffers," knavish returning boards, and a high joint electoral commission smile complacently. The witnesses are at the door clamoring to prove the stupendous crime; but it is Ordered, That the evidence offered be not received.

And the man without a title prepares to seize upon the state!

ELECTION IN NORTHERN CITIES.

Report of the Committee to Investigate Alleged Frauds in the Cities of New York, Jersey City, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia.

Mr. COX, from the committee appointed to investigate into alleged frauds in the cities of New York, Jersey City, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia, submits the following report:

They have visited the several cities named and have been restricted by the resolution as nearly as possible to the examination of complaints and charges of fraud at the last election of Congressmen and presidential electors. The committee have examined hundreds of witnesses in the several cities and have found what is incidental to all great cities, instances here and there of fraud, but those instances have generally been with reference to local elections, like those of aldermen, and not to matters connected with Federal politics. This remark is not applicable to Philadelphia. That city, as will be seen, is and has been for many years, as well as this year, a monstrous exception, inasmuch as there seems to be a system, fixed and chrystallized, for bad franchise.

The committee have discarded all inquiry as to matters that do not pertain to Federal affairs.

"NEW LOTS."

Much time was spent, or misspent, in the examination of an outside borough, called "New Lots," which was adjacent to Brooklyn, but not within the jurisdiction of the committee. Some evidence was given which would lead to one practical suggestion, and that is that a registry would be useful for voting-districts near large cities. Nothing of much consequence, however, was elicited which should cast any reproach on the election of any member of Congress within the cities of New York, Jersey City, and Brooklyn, much less change any result as to the electors for President.

CREDIT TO BOTH PARTIES.

The bulk of the testimony taken in the cities of New York, Jersey City, and Brooklyn shows beyond a doubt that there was an unusually fair conduct of each election, which does credit to the virtue, intelligence, and citizenship of those cities. In the city of New York, the commissioners of police, who have certain functions in an election, were equally divided between the two parties, though the local organization, outside of the Federal officers, was democratic. It is unnecessary to discuss to whom should be distributed the honor of making this election so unusually prudent and just.

The committee are of opinion that both parties contributed to that result. In Jersey City and Brooklyn the democrats succeeded by large majorities, even with a republican local government. The percentage of fraud was very small in those cities, because of providence, care, and unity for honesty among men of all parties. The committee take pleasure in commending the action of the United States officers, especially the supervisors of election in those cities; and the more especially because the Federal election law has not heretofore been administered with much satisfaction in those cities. The Federal officers seem, however, this year, to have worked harmoniously not only with the local organisms, but with each other.

CREDIT TO OFFICIALS.

Whatever may be said about the United States law as to elections or their supervision by United States authority; whatever may be said as to the right of a State to regulate in all ways such elections, this must be said, that the administration of the law by Commissioners Davenport, Muirhead, and Allen, the United States functionaries and their subordinates, was eminently just and wise and conducive to a fair public expression in a presidential year of unusual excitement and great temptation. The testimony of Mr. Davenport, the United States commissioner for the southern district of New York, is a remarkable statement, which the committee would adopt as the basis of their report as to the three cities.

COMMISSIONER DAVENPORT'S PLAN.

Step by step he developed to the committee his action from the first applications made to the circuit court under the Federal election law for the appointment of supervisors of registration and election down to the last moment when he arrested those who had violated the law. Both political organizations presented applications for the appointment of supervisors. The court, following the decision of Judge Woodruff in 1872, recognized the lists which were indorsed by the State and national committees. Objections were made and heard, so as to purge the lists, and in the whole five hundred and sixty-nine electoral districts two supervisors of different parties were on hand to supervise the registry and aid the local or State officials. The books were sent to the United States supervisor and were compared. The name, the number of the house, the number of rooms or floors, and other descriptions as to nativity, color, length of residence in the assembly district, county, and State of the voter were promptly made. Naturalization was inquired into and other qualifications, and if disqualified, why disqualified; instructions were then issued and printed in the books delivered to the supervisors. They are found in the testimony of Mr. Davenport. The same care was pursued in the cities adjacent to New York. There never was an election where such thorough preliminary investigation was required or had as to the registration or as to the ballots, or the poll-lists, tallies, check-books, certificates, statements, and returns by the State and other officers. No interference was allowed so as to defraud the honest voter of his right, except in a few instances, and no fraudulent votes were given except on very rare occasions.

DETAILS OF THE SYSTEM.

The instructions referred to went down to the remotest and smallest detail. The supervisor himself had the names before him of men who had before voted and who had not moved within two years. He knew all about every one of that class of voters and checked them as correct in all such cases. After deducting the names of those who had registered in the preceding two years, and who had moved since 1872, he eliminated with the aid of the list from that time, 90,000 names from a registry of 183,000. This examination satisfied the committee that the proportion of people who do not move between an election of one year and the election of next year is about 50 or 55 per cent. Many of those, it will be remembered, do not move out of the election district, but simply change their residence from a given house. After causing a strict and vigilant examination to be made as to the names of those who were on the registry, another list was made and handed to the Federal supervisors. These men were men of intelligence, required to be so by law, and better fitted than deputy marshals for a work of such importance and delicacy. This work was done a second time, by men who went from house to house with the lists, for the age of a voter, his residence, and other matters, so as to identify him and estop fraud. Then the names of those who could not be found were marked. The two reports are then compared by the supervisor. Sometimes these reports have been made by different men. These precautions were taken, it is said, so as to avoid the issuance of warrants on the simple statement of any one that the party did not reside at a house where he had sworn he did reside. When all the reports agreed that the man did not live at the place, it was then considered a prima facie case and arrests were ordered. For certain reasons policemen are not always the best agents to make such inquiries. In certain districts he does not get correct answers. The persons fear that he has a warrant and are cautious. A deputy marshal with a badge is in the same predicament. The internal-revenue officer is looked upon with still more suspicion. The letter-carriers, however, are used with better effect, so as to ascertain, even to the very tops of the tenement buildings, whether such and such a man resided where he professed to reside. Letters were addressed to all persons who were suspected. These letter-carriers are bound by law to state on the back of the envelope why the letter is not delivered, either that the party is dead, or has removed, or cannot be found, or never resided at the place.

PRECAUTIONS TO PREVENT HONEST VOTERS FROM LOSING THEIR VOTES.

The United States commissioner, along with the mayor of the city, and the president of the board of police, General Smith, had a meeting to allay any excitement occasioned by rumors which always precede an election. The United States marshal, district attorney, and the counsel of the corporation of New York were called in. They were men of various politics. They came to an agreement, which was signed, so as to execute the law without straining it, and so as to adjudicate without irritation or impediment, the questions which might arise during the day of election. Throughout the whole length of New York, sixteen and a quarter miles, arrangements were made to prevent bringing men any distance from their homes or the polling-place. The commissioners were distributed over the city, and from early morning until after the polls closed cases were taken before them, and information given by them as to voting. Four lawyers were selected, General Barlow, Mr. Alderman Billings, Mr. Marbury, and Mr. Olney. They, too, were equally divided as to politics, and the rule was adopted that whenever they found a reasonable and well-founded doubt as to a person being a legal voter, the voter should get the benefit of the doubt, so that he could take an oath under challenge, and have applied to him by the inspectors the test of the law. It was intended to provide not only against fraudulent votes, but that no person really entitled to a vote should be refused. The political organizations concurred with Mr. Davenport in this arrangement. It proved a decided success, and the result was, what all who have any knowledge of this New York election have concurred in confirming, that there was comparatively no fraud, and the attempts made to repress it were welcomed by both parties and carried out in good faith.

The committee beg to state, with some degree of pride, and to repel all statements to the contrary, that the first report only showed four thousand cases of attempts at fraudulent registration during the first two days of the registration, and some seven or eight thousand in all. This is in remarkable contrast with the registration in Philadelphia. In the latter city of less population and fewer votes, the baseness of the registration is simply monstrous. Not only was the fraudulent registration greatly in excess in the smaller city, but the precautions taken in New York for honest registration were so consummate and pure that New York shines, like a "good deed in a naughty world," compared with Philadelphia and other communities farther South!

ARRESTS, AND WHY.

To proceed with the details of the New York plan: Then, after learning all th particulars respecting the fraudulent persons, only two thousand doubtful case were left, and this out of a registry of 183,000. It seemed necessary, however, to issue only about fifteen hundred warrants. The moment the man appeared to vote against whose name the word "warrant" was written, he was challenged; but of all that great number on the island of Manhattan, there were not more than three thousand who were found to have moved before the first day of the registry and election day. Those names were stricken off without arrest. It is unnecesary to state in full all the precautions taken to guard against fraud at the various points. They are fully recounted in the testimony of Mr. Whitney, Mr. Bliss, Mr. Davenport, and the accomplished and dutiful officers of the adjacent cities, Messrs. Muirhead and Allen.

Of course the United States marshal had his deputies to execute the warrants. There was one marshal for each election district. Extracts from the United States statutes were sent out in circulars, together with directions to supervisors and deputy marshals. More care could not have been taken, in the judgment of the committee, for the verification of the registry and the purity of the election.

A PATTERN FOR IMITATION.

The committee would commend to other portions of the country and to other cities this remarkable system, developed through the agency of both local and Federal authorities acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world and in no era of time, where there has been an expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there ever been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions. Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in the future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the electoral franchise.

From the moment the supervisors are appointed, from the moment that the lists are purged, from the moment that the applications are examined, to the very last return of the popular expression, this election shows the calm mastery of prudence. For this due credit should be given to men of both parties, and especially to the corporation counsel, Mr. Whitney, and United States supervisors.

Mr. Commissioner Davenport had maps of every house and building in the city. These maps were corrected regularly every thirty days. You cannot build a wing to your house, or change its number, or add to its stories or rooms, or change the character or quality of the dwelling, without its being registered by the supervisor. All the doubtful, or suspected, or bad houses are registered and known. When these changes are made that fact is brought to the attention of the functionaries in charge of the trust, and all trouble appeased and all wrong rectified.

ONLY THIRTY ASCERTAINED ILLEGAL VOTERS IN NEW YORK.

So that, as a compendious statement resulting from these prudential measures, it may be said that out of 183,000 registered votes only fifteen hundred warrants were required against those suspected of fraud; and out of those fifteen hundred for whom warrants were issued only three hundred came to the polls. Those three hundred were arrested, but they were generally of a class which has a right to vote. The rascals are frightened and kept away by the advertisement of their names as fraudulently registered. Of those three hundred arrested, 90 per cent. were allowed to vote as legal voters, after trial.

Of course mistakes here and there occurred. Errors were made in consequence of mistakes of voters themselves as to registering their residence, but those mistakes were, as far as could be, remedied; and it would be wrong to hold the system pursued by State and Federal officers responsible for a few flecks and specks. The committee does not mean to justify the publication of the names of those who are thus advised that they will be arrested, for there may be many honest men in the list, who, apprehending arrest, may lose their honest votes. But in spite of these harsh measures which may deprive some of the franchise, the committee are decided in the opinion that the result is an astounding one where out of 183,000 registered only about three hundred men were arrested, and only thirty of them were held. Mr. Davenport says that in the cases of many of the arrests "the fault was with the inspector and supervisor, and not with the man himself, and this will show how heedful the examination was, that of all who were discharged I think there was hardly one man who could not have voted. There were some who were committed and did not vote; but I should say 90 per cent. of them were allowed to vote." As in New York, so in Jersey City and Brooklyn, the commissioners were busy and critical, but at the same time liberal toward those who had a right to vote.

NATURALIZATION FRAUDS, FEW IF ANY.

The committee was abundantly satisfied from the testimony of the various officers of the courts, State and Federal, that little or no fraud was committed as to naturalization. There was a less number of persons naturalized this year than there has been before for years at any presidential election save 1872, and the number was then a little below that of this year. The United States detectives were in all the courts to watch with vigilance any attempts of fraudulent naturalization. Scarcely a mistake was made. The committee would refer to the various statements of witnesses as to the number naturalized in the three cities.

In 1876 there were 10,832 naturalized in New York, which is 900 more than 1872, and about 1,400 less than any presidential year save 1872. This was as to the State courts. About the same ratio occurs in the other courts. Only some twelve or fifteen men were arrested for fraudulent naturalization in the city of New York. The judges were men of absolute integrity, and no man who knows anything of the New York bench as now organized, suspects for a moment that there was any considerable fraudulent practice.

CALCULATIONS ON POPULATION, VOTERS, REGISTRY, ETC.

The United States commissioner has confirmed the statement of other officers which the committee has before referred to, that that was as fair an election as he had ever known in the city of New York, and his demonstration seems literally irrefragable. He begins with the year 1835 for his calculations. Then New York had 43,091 voters. The increase since then in the voting population was 4.42 per cent. From 1835 to 1845 it was 4.83; from 1845 to 1855 it was 4.09; from 1855 to 1865 it was 4.42; and from 1865 to 1875 it was 4.45, making a total of 177 per cent. in forty years or 4.42 per cent. per year. The commissioner, taking the voting population of 1835 and the increase per cent. shows a priori that we should have had in 1845, 62,947; the State census returns 63,927—being a very small difference in the decade. From 1845 to 1855 the per cent. of increase, by a law almost as exact as science, would give 89,601; the State census returned 88,877, or a difference of 724 only in twenty years. Going to the third decade we find the per cent. of increase would give 129,201. The State census returned 128,975, or a difference of only 226 in thirty years. Taking the same per cent. from 1865 to 1875 and the year 1876, we would have 194,545; yet the vote cast was only 173,681, and the registry about 183,000. There can be no logical dissent from figures of this kind. It would be well to observe the ratio of voters to population in the several years. Calculations of this kind are much more useful and reliable than mere sporadic cases of fraud, growing out of personal or local ambitions. In 1840 the ratio of votes cast to population was 1 to 7.26. In the next presidential year, 1844, it was 1 to 6.56; in 1848, 1 to 9.46; in 1852, 1 to 9.75; in 1856, 1 to 8.57; in 1860, 1 to 8.51; in 1864, 1 to 6.74; in 1868, 1 to 5.49; in 1872, on a very light vote, it was 1 to 7.33; and in 1876, it was 1 to 6.21. This shows a difference between 1876 and 1864 of only .53 per cent. This calculation might be made more elaborate. In the testimony of Mr. Davenport there is an elaboration of it, the logic of which is unassailable. The ratios of various years prove each other, not only as to the proportion between voters and population, but as to the proportion of votes actually cast to voters. By the table thus prepared it is almost an absolute certainty as to where or in what years fraud predominates. In 1848 the proportion of votes cast to voters was 69 to 100; in 1852, 71; in 1856, 85; in 1860, 87.40; in 1864, 88; in 1868, 108, when the proportion should have been 88; in 1872, 79.40; in 1876, 78.40. All the elements of growth belonging to a large city like New York, including the southern element which has come in since the war, and the immigration which has been running down in the last two years, confirm the fact and furnish the reason why the proportion of voters to population is greater than heretofore. They also show that 1876 was not a year of excess or fraud, whatever may be affirmed of other years.

It will also be remembered that the ratio of the voters to the population has always been much greater in the State and in many other localities than in the city of New York. There is no doubt that the ratio of votes cast in New York State is a fair average for the city as shown by the statistics of other years when no fraud was charged, and that the vote was not inordinate in 1876 and should not be charged as excessive or fraudulent. The closeness of the vote to the registry is not much greater than it has been or will be at any election of a presidential character. In 1871, known as an "honest year," the vote was but 6⅜ per cent. below the registry. This year with a presidential election of much excitement it was 6 per cent. below.

One conclusion beyond any doubt is that New York City had over 194,000 voters, while her registry was about ten thousand less; but the registration bears a fair ratio with that of former years.

CO-OPERATION OF OFFICERS AND PARTIES.

This happy result was the consequence of co-operation between the official advises of the city and United States officers. The party organizations, by their regulations and orders, made the city police one in action along with the United States marshals. Mr. Kelly himself, a conspicuous leader from the leading organization of the city, issued his orders that there should be no collision between the Federal and State authorities; inasmuch as he was satisfied that all were intent on an honest vote. The city police were unusually vigilant in their orders and in their subordinates. They were in constant communication with the United States authorities, and gave full lists of all persons who had offered themselves as inspectors. They reported to the police captains as to the character, habits, &c., of inspectors. It is the opinion of the United States commissioner, Mr. Davenport, who is a republican, that the republicans held their own by reason of many accessions from the democrats; but the increase was not as large proportionately in the republican wards as in the democratic wards. In truth there was no motive on the part of any organization, for reasons not necessary to discuss in an official report, why fraud should have been committed. The democratic party had harmonized its difficulties, and the motive for fraud which occurs in all parties between rivals, was absent.

It ought also to be remembered by those who are critical as to New York that since 1872 two new wards have been added to the city with 5,000 votes.

All cases of fraud which were brought to the attention of the committee were thoroughly examined, and the committee went so far as to find out that no more vigilance could have been exercised by any arrangement known to the law to prevent fraudulent voting. The telegraph, post-office, and police, and all the legal and police paraphernalia were in constant requisition and use to avoid any bad registry or voting. Conferences among the best men, irrespective of party, and the co-operation among men of all parties, and the watchfulness on both sides of the Hudson and East Rivers, counsel given and received from all classes of officials, all with the one main object, effectually estopped a fraudulent presentment of the popular wish.

Whether this work, which is unexampled, should be accounted a republican work, through their Federal election law, or the work of the local authorities and organisms, inspired by a desire for an honest vote among the people, who were especially jealous of it on account of what was occurring elsewhere, one thing the committee must report, that it approximated as near to perfection as it was possible to do. There were no riots, no fights, no bayonets, no disturbance, no conflicts of authority, and none of the concomitants which accompany fraud and endanger free institutions.

The people of the country owe a tribute of respect to the police of a city of more than a million, and to the United States officers who numbered thousands, for the harmony of action between the various officers, so as to illustrate to all the world how the imperial island city can conduct herself under great excitement and in view of startling events!

COMPARISON WITH OTHER CITIES.

There is a special felicity in the fact that neither party can claim the entire credit of this grand result, inasmuch as in New York City the republicans had the Federal control and the democrats the local control, and inasmuch as the cities were democratic; while in Jersey City and Brooklyn, where the local governments were republican, the same happy results were obtained. It afforded not merely the opportunity but the illustration of an election so much needed in a country where there is so much competition and collision. It is no part of our purpose to commend the economy of the last election as to mere expenditures, or to praise one class of officers beyond their desert or more than another class, but in comparison with the shackling and dishonest system of voting prevalent for many years in other cities, and especially in Philadelphia, the city of New York is as Hyperion to a satyr. Her example should be an example to the City of Brotherly Love, and should encourage her to be rid of her tortuous, troublesome, and dishonest system. Had the system of registration and vigilance and scrutiny prevailed in Philadelphia which was exercised in New York, other results pertaining to prosperity and contentment would have been the consequence.

The committee, therefore, dismiss all the small spots on the surface of the body which attract the attention of the superficial, in order to attest, as they have endeavored to attest, the thorough health of the constitution of the body-politic of the great metropolis in so far as the last expression of her suffragans is an index of such health.

They would, therefore, beg leave to report to the House, that having listened to all that was necessary under the resolution from all parties, and all the complaints that are incidental to a large city, little, if any odium, this year, can be laid on the cities of New York, Jersey City, and Brooklyn, which seem to be bound up in a trinity of honest, fair electoral dealing.

The principal part of the examination as to Philadelphia election frauds was taken by a subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. RICE, WADDELL, and WELLS. A majority of that subcommittee has digested the facts as to the

and submit the following report:

The subcommittee met at the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, on 5th January, and daily thereafter until 15th January, examining witnesses and taking testimony on the subject-matter of the investigation.

It appears from the evidence taken that the system of registration in Philadelphia is open to grave and serious objections, and that the whole machinery of registration and election is peculiar to that city and State. The provisions of the new constitution of Pennsylvania in regard to the subject of suffrage and election are, we think, well adapted to secure the purity of the ballot, but the registration and election laws do not seem to us to reflect the spirit of the constitution.

The system of registration under the law requires the assessors to take the registration of voters in their respective election precincts in the first week of June of each year, and for that purpose they take the transcript of the next preceding assessment, as given them by the city or county commissioners, and proceed to revise the same by visiting every house or dwelling in their respective divisions, and making careful inquiry as to any person whose name is on the list, whether or not he has died or removed from the division, and if so, to erase the same therefrom; or whether any qualified voter resides therein whose name is not on the list, and if so, to add the same thereto; and to inquire whether or not the person so added has the legitimate right to be a voter in the division.

The assessors are presumed to be appointed or elected because of their knowledge of the divisions in which their services are to be performed, and, under the law, the voters of any division are not to exceed two hundred and fifty. If they do, the division, before the next election ensuing, has to be subdivided.

EXCESSIVE AND FRAUDULENT REGISTRATION.

It appears that the whole system of registration, true or fraudulent, is to a great extent in the hands of the assessors, and if they perform their duty faithfully and well but little correction would be required in their returns; but from the evidence this is not the case, for frequently persons holding other offices are elected as assessors; and it does seem that very frequently men have been selected for the purpose of making excessive registrations rather than true and correct ones.

At the last election in Philadelphia, it appears from the testimony, the registration was from twenty-five to thirty thousand excessive. In the city of Philadelphia, with a population of about eight hundred thousand, the registration of last year was over 186,000, while in the city of New York, with a population nearly 50 per cent. greater, the registration was but 183,000. It is observable that the number of votes cast in Philadelphia in November last was about 47,000 less than the number of votes previously registered.

TWENTY THOUSAND WITH A RED CROSS.

The fact of the excessive registration in Philadelphia becomes more apparent when it is known that over twenty thousand of the names registered were successfully attacked, and the names stricken off or marked with a red cross. And it is a matter of no little surprise that over nine-tenths of the names thus attacked in court were so attacked by democratic petitions. According to the evidence the courts to which those petitions were returned were engaged for a month previous to the election in trying those cases alone; and but for want of time very many more names would have been stricken off, ninety petitions which had been returned not having been reached in the investigation by the courts.

According to the testimony of Mr. Thomas Fahy, one of the commissioners of the city of Philadelphia, there were eighty-two hundred and eighty-two names stricken absolutely from the list, and twelve thousand or thirteen thousand marked with a red cross under order of the courts, they being in doubt as to whether to draw a red line through them and strike them off absolutely, or to put a red cross opposite them, which would signify that they were dead, or removed from the division within sixty days of the election, and consequently not proper names to be on the registration-list. A large majority of those eighty-two hundred and eighty-two were myths, people who had no existence in fact: and the same with a large proportion of the twelve thousand or thirteen thousand marked with a red cross, though many of them had doubtless died or moved from the division in which their names appeared. The evil of this matter, and the bad use to which this system is put, is in this: that names appearing on the registration-list could be used on the day of election by repeaters and personators almost without possibility of detection; and the system of personating and repeating appears to be largely in vogue in that city. Under the law a man by merely giving a name appearing on the registration-list is permitted to vote on the production of his tax receipt or on his swearing that he has paid his taxes within two years. Hence the purpose of leaving improper and mythical names on the list in order that they may be used by repeaters or personators.

The testimony of Charles Henry Jones, esq., attorney, corroborates entirely the evidence of Mr. Fahy in regard to the fact above alluded to.

The evidence shows that in very many instances there were large and excessive registration-lists, in some cases having double the number of names that legitimately ought to have been registered, and it cannot be accidental that in a great number of republican divisions the list was largely excessive. It therefore appears to your committee that the assessors, in very many instances, committed a great breach of duty in certifying names to the county commissioners which were not those of bona fide residents of their divisions, but under the law the assessors can protect themselves from detection, to a great degree, by leaving improper names, or names of those removed or dead on their lists; thereby making a false registration, when they could not do so by adding false or fictitious names; but the first means would answer the fraudulent end as well or better than the last, because it would seem to have the form of law. That the party in power in Philadelphia, since the adoption of the new constitution, has pursued this course, thereby causing an excessive and illegal registration, on which to vote by repeaters or personators, there can be but little doubt.

DEMOCRATIC EFFORTS TO PURIFY.

From the evidence taken it appears that all the substantial efforts to purify and purge the registration were made by the democratic party or the attorneys of the democratic committee; and on the other hand it is equally evident that all obstacles possible to prevent this purgation of the registration-lists were interposed by the party in opposition. In other words, it seemed to be the object of the attorneys of the democratic party to purge and purify the registration-lists, while it seemed to be the object of the opposition to leave them as large as possible.

Your committee would call particular attention to the fact that the chief supervisor of elections for the city of Philadelphia (a Federal officer) failed to do his duty in this, that he did not instruct the supervisors under him to canvass and purge the registration-lists in order to find who were bona fide citizens and voters, as was done in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City. And further, that he instructed his supervisors that the pay would not be sufficient to compensate them for time spent in performing their duty. It seems to us that if proper effort had been made in that direction an amount of money sufficient to have compensated them for their duties could have been secured without difficulty. A large amount was devoted to that purpose in the city of New York. Why could it not have been secured for Philadelphia as well?

It is established by the testimony that the office holders and appointees, Federal, State and municipal, in Philadelphia are from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand in number, and that they are almost entirely republicans, every one of whom, according to the testimony of Mr. Welsh, is appointed and holds his place for partisan purposes. In reaching a conclusion in reference to the management of political affairs in Philadelphia the committee have relied much on the testimony of this gentleman, a venerable and well-known citizen of that community and a republican. According to his testimony it has long been the custom in Philadelphia to swell the list of employés in the various departments of the city government enormously, just previous to an election, and he unhesitatingly asserted that the increased number of employés was appointed not only that their own votes might be, as they were, controlled by those who gave them their places, but because they were supposed to control a certain additional number of votes. This gentleman has for some time been ardently enlisted in the cause of municipal reform in that city, and some idea of the necessity of it may be formed from a statement which he made in these words: (to be found in his testimony accompanying this report)

"Things have not yet got quite bad enough for me. I should like to have anarchy for a couple of months, and then we could have things right. Times would then be so bad as to produce a reaction."

AN HONEST VOTE WOULD HAVE GIVEN A DIFFERENT RESULT.

In conclusion your committee deem it proper to say that in the election held in Philadelphia on the 7th of November last for Congressmen and presidential electors, and especially in the registration preceding it, there were very great irregularities and numerous attempts to perpetrate fraud by the party in power, and but for which the result would probably have been different; the remedy for which, in a great degree, might be found in an amendment of the election and registration laws in that State.

For want of time the subcommittee did not go into the investigation of frauds in detail at the last election in Philadelphia, but on the 15th of January adjourned subject to the call of the chairman of the whole committee. The subcommittee deem it due to themselves to say that this report has not been sooner presented, and is now put in this imperfect manner, for the reason that, owing to the large accumulation of matter to be printed coming from the various other investigating committees, it has been impossible to have the testimony taken by us printed. In making this report the committee has been compelled to resort to the manuscript evidence, of which there is quite a large volume.

S. S. COX, Chairman.

A. M. WADDELL.

MINORITY REPORT.

Report of the minority of the committee to investigate alleged election frauds in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Philadelphia, at the November election in 1876.

The minority of the committe report to the House as follows:

The committee met at the Saint Nicholas Hotel, in the city of New York, on the 18th day of December, 1876, in accordance with the following resolution of December 11, 1876:

Mr. COX moved that the rules be suspended, so as to enable him to submit, and the House to agree to, the following resolution, viz:

"'Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, to examine into any alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress at the late election in each of said cities.'

"And the question being put, the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the said resolution was agreed to."

As soon as the committee organized, Mr. MACDOUGALL offered a resolution calling upon the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company to furnish, under a subpœna duces tecum, copies of all telegrams sent and received during the autumn campaign by Samuel J. Tilden, Abram S. Hewitt, Colonel W. T. Pelton, John Morrissey, and John Kelly which might bear upon the elections in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Jersey City, and Brooklyn.

Objection was made by the majority on the ground that the resolution under which the committee were appointed did not authorize them to send for persons and papers, the chairman (Mr. COX) claiming that he copied the language of the resolution offered the same day in the House by Mr. MACDOUGALL; whereupon Mr. MACDOUGALL produced his resolution, which is as follows:

[From House Journal, December 11, 1876.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved that the rules be suspended so as to enable him to submit, and the House to agree to, the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, to examine into the alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress at the late election in each of said cities; also, a committee of five to proceed to the State of Virginia to examine and report whether election frauds have been committed, or intimidation of voters used, in the second and fourth congressional districts of said State at the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress; also, a committee of nine to proceed to the State of Mississippi to examine and report whether any frauds have been committed, or intimidation of voters used, in the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress: also, that a committee of five be appointed to proceed to the city of Philadelphia, to examine into and report whether there was fraudulent registration and voting in said city previous to and at the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress; also, a committee of three to proceed to the State of Alabama to examine into and report whether any intimidation was used, or illegal votes cast, at the recent election for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress in the fourth congressional district of said State; and that each of said committees have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and be attended by a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and that they have the privilege to report at any time.

And the question being put,

Will the House agree to the motion to suspend the rules?

It was decided in the negative, { Yeas ..... 124 / Nays ..... 88 / Not voting 78

So the rules were not suspended, and the resolution was not agreed to.

It will be observed that the resolution under which the committee acted is far from the same as the one offered in the House previously by Mr. MACDOUGALL, inasmuch as it omits any allusion to intimidation and fraud in any of the Southern States, and fails to empower them to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WADDELL then presented the following:

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the power to issue subpœna duces tecum was not conferred by the House of Representatives on this committee, further action on the matter be indefinitely postponed."

Mr. MACDOUGALL offered the following as a substitute:

"Whereas the original resolution offered by Mr. COX, under which this committee was appointed, fails to empower the committee to send for persons and papers; therefore,

"Resolved, That the committee ask the House of Representatives to empower them to send for persons and papers and to enforce subpœnas duces tecum."

Mr. WADDELL accepted the substitute, and it was adopted.

So far as known, the House was never asked by the majority to so empower the committee, and, although frequently asked by the minority to do so, no action was ever taken on the resolution.

The committee commenced the investigation by the examination of witnesses relative to the election in the village of New Lots, or East New York, which is a part of the third congressional district. A great amount of testimony was taken, showing that men who were known to reside in Brooklyn had voted at the election in New Lots. In one instance it was shown that a whole block of houses were tenanted a few days before the election and deserted the day after; that a large number of men voted from this block. It is but due to the Representative from this district to state that nothing was shown to in any way implicate him in any of these transactions and not enough illegal voting was proven to in any way affect his election.

A registry-law in the towns adjacent to New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City would prevent much illegal voting. One witness testified that at the spring election men were brought out from Brooklyn in wagon-loads, and their votes offered at fifty cents each. According to the opinion of the best informed citizens who do, as well as those who do not, take an active interest in political matters, the vote was an excessive one in New Lots, and many fraudulent votes were cast.

COLONIZATION IN DIFFERENT WARDS.

The system of colonization shown to exist in Brooklyn, whereby voters are transferred from one ward to another just previous to the day of election, cannot be too severely condemned. The minority showed clearly that this system was carried on to an alarming extent; and while it does not affect the presidential vote, it is very clearly shown that it can and does affect the congressional vote; and in many of the close districts might have changed the result.

The majority tried to show that this was done out of purely local strife, and solely for the purpose of influencing the aldermanic elections in close wards; but if colonization took place from one congressional district to another, it is as clear that it would affect the congressional as the aldermanic election.

At the time the committee so arbitrarily adjourned in New York, on the 27th of December, the minority of the committee had the books and witnesses in the committee-room at the Saint Nicholas Hotel to show that 250 votes had been colonized into one ward in Brooklyn, and that they had removed from the ward the day after the election. All such propositions were wholly disregarded by the majority, and no sooner made than voted down, the whole aim of the majority being to prevent rather than to ascertain whether frauds had been committed.

THE ELECTION IN JERSEY CITY.

The election in Jersey City, so far as the committee's investigation was permitted to go, was conducted very much the same as that in Brooklyn. Persons of the highest character and respectability, old citizens who had lived for years in Jersey City, swore positively that persons voted at the different polling-places who were utter strangers; that they came to the locality a few days before the election, and were never seen after election-day. That many of these were properly registered there can be no doubt, but they come clearly under the same category as the parties who are transferred from one ward to another in Brooklyn. They are usually young men, without families. There is nothing to prevent a man from registering in Brooklyn, New York, and Jersey City, and voting in all three of these places on the day of election by a system of collusion with boarding-house keepers and political "bummers" who are engaged in that sort of business, and the system so ably advocated by Commissioners Davenport, Muirhead, and Allen be powerless to prevent them; in fact, the system itself, while no doubt productive of much good, is so thoroughly understood as to aid those disposed to colonize men from place to place under assumed names for the purposes of illegal voting. Men appeared at the polling-places in Jersey City, that the officers of the election had never seen and did not know, voted upon names upon the registry-list and then disappeared, no one ever seeing them again. These men, it was shown, all voted the democratic ticket. The increase from 1875 to 1876 in Jersey City was over three-fourths democratic.

The shameless fact was shown that a gentleman who lived himself at Irvington in the summer and New York in the winter, but who was engaged in the business of sugar-refining in Jersey City, was at the polls all day in that city, and had his employés marched up in squads and ordered to vote as he directed. He visited all the polling-places in the city, and so directed the votes of the men in his employ, said to be about two thousand in number.

In one election-district in Jersey City it was estimated that 300 to 350 voters were colonized. The vote was about 1,000 more than ever polled in that district before, even in the most hotly-contested election.

The very intelligent testimony of Mr. F. H. Snyder shows that upon inquiry at houses in which voters were supposed to be colonized they (the inmates) would answer that all names upon the registry-lists resided there; and when asked about fictitious names, they would also answer that such people resided there, showing clearly that an understanding existed with these people. Mr. Snyder swears positively that with a full knowledge of the system as carried out by Supervisor Muirhead in Jersey City, sharp men, who were usually engaged in such transactions, could colonize 5,000 voters in Jersey City, and Mr. Muirhead and his assistants be powerless to find it out. Mr. Muirhead bears testimony to the infallibility of his system, and thinks he performed his duties in such manner that few, if any, illegal votes were cast. Mr. Muirhead undoubtedly went through the routine of the different modes adopted by them for purging the registry; but it appears that not sufficient time was allowed to accomplish a thorough purging of the registry-lists. There is a great amount of testimony bearing upon this point, and the vote in Jersey City may be put down as excessive, and to a more or less degree fraudulent.

THE ELECTION IN NEW YORK.

The committee spent but comparatively little time in investigating the elections in the city of New York, the majority apparently being satisfied with the assertion of the chairman, made in the House of Representatives prior to the committee's departure, that there were no frauds in New York, and the testimony of a few witnesses whose duty it was to see that no frauds were committed.

The testimony of Henry J. Ottarson, for forty years a journalist and statistician, for many years the compiler of the Whig or Tribune Almanac, goes far to show, and he gives facts and figures to show, that there was both an excessive registration and an excessive vote in the city of New York. The testimony of George Bliss shows that there was much fraudulent naturalization, and that with all the precaution taken, not one-tenth of it was detected. Some persons would appear as witnesses for a dozen different persons who were afterward ascertained to be naturalized fraudulently. He adds, "The judges must have sat upon the bench and known that perjury was being committed before them right along, and they were powerless to prevent it."

The testimony shows that of all the arrests and complaints made, none were against republicans; one man was arrested who had been concerned in fifty-two fraudulent naturalizations, although it was not within the city limits. All the men arrested had the Tammany Hall naturalization tickets; one of them was president of a democratic club, another was the sergeant-at-arms of a democratic club. It will be seen by the testimony that paupers from Bellevue Hospital were taken to the polls and voted.

The election in the seventh congressional district attracted the attention of the committee, from the fact that in 1874 the republican candidate for Representative in Congress, Mr. Charles Spencer, received 6,000 votes; the democratic candidate, Mr. Smith Ely, jr., 7,400; while at the last election the republican candidate, Wallace P. Groom, received 6,050, the democratic candidate, Mr Anthony Eickhoff, received over 13,000.

From all the testimony taken, it was shown that the population of this district had remained almost unchanged for the past two years, yet 6,000 more votes were polled in 1876 for the democratic candidate for Representative than were polled for Mr. Ely in 1874, although it was admitted that Mr. Ely was very popular and ran fully up to, if not ahead of, his ticket.

In the eleventh congressional district it is alleged that about two hundred paupers (having no vote) were brought from Blackwell's Island and voted the democratic ticket. The minority had witnesses who would swear to these facts, but were not permitted to call them on account of the arbitrary adjournment.

It seemed to be pretty generally conceded by the best informed persons, editors of prominent public journals, lawyers, and merchants, with whom the minority consulted, that, notwithstanding all the precaution and vigilance used, at least 20,000 fraudulent votes were cast in the city of New York alone.

The limited time allowed by the majority for the examination of witnesses, and examination into the elections in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, did not admit of as thorough a search into the merits and demerits of Mr. Davenport's system as was desirable.

The majority, after a very long and tedious direct examination, based solely upon the assumption that the ballot in New York was better guarded and purer than any place on earth, turned the witness over to the minority only half an hour previous to the time when they had by a strict party vote decided to adjourn to meet in Philadelphia. The minority objected to proceed with the cross-examination of Mr. Davenport, as scarcely sufficient time remained to commence it, certainly not to finish, and filed the following protest:

"The minority protest against the action of the majority of this committee in summarily adjourning to meet in Philadelphia on Thursday, the 4th day of January, inasmuch as we have no time to cross-examine Mr. John I. Davenport and to proceed with the examination of witnesses, many of whom are now present in the committee-room, by whom we propose to show that there was a large number of fraudulent naturalizations and fraudulent registrations previous to, and a large number of fraudulent votes cast at, the last election in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City."

This apparently not being what the majority of the committee cared to have shown, the question was put to vote, and decided against the wishes of the minority by a strict party vote.

THE ELECTION IN PHILADELPHIA.

The committee met at the Continental Hotel in Philadelphia on the 5th of January, and remained in session daily until January 15, a portion of the time a subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. Rice, Waddell, and Wells, being detailed to take testimony.

The minority of the committee do not agree with the report of the majority as to the registration and election in Philadelphia. It appears from the evidence that the most perfect system of registration is adopted for the city of Philadelphia. The provisions of the new constitution of Pennsylvania in regard to the subject of suffrage and election in that State and city are, we think, adapted to secure the purity of the ballot. The Legislature has provided with the greatest care by the enactment of most stringent election laws to govern the registration and the depositing of the ballot so as to secure a pure, free, and full ballot.

The system of registration under the law requires the assessors to take a registration of the voters in the first week in June in each year, and for that purpose they take a transcript of the next preceeding registration or assessment as given them by the city or county commissioners, and proceed to visit every house and dwelling in their respective divisions, and to make a careful inquiry as to any person whose name is on the list, whether or not he has died or removed from the division, and, if so, they erase the same therefrom; also, whether any qualified voter resides there whose name is not on the list; and if any are found they add the same thereto, and at the same time inquire whether the person so added has a right to vote in the division. The assessor is then required, prior to the first Monday in August in each year, to put one copy of the registration-list on the door of the house where the election in the respective district is required to be held, and to retain a copy in his possession for inspection of each and every person who shall desire to see the same. It is furthermore made his duty to add from time to time the name of such claimant who shall ask to be placed on the list, and mark opposite the name C. V., and immediately assess him, noting his occupation, residence, whether a boarder or a housekeeper, and whether naturalized or designing to be, and to mark in all cases opposite the name the letters N. D. I. or I. N., as the case may be.

It is also made the duty of the assessor to be present at the election-house in the said election-district during the two days next preceding the day fixed for returning the lists to the county commissioners, from ten a. m. to three p. m. and from six p. m. to nine p. m. of each of said days, for hearing applications that may be made under the provisions of such section relating to the names on said list, or sought to be placed thereon or struck therefrom; and it is made his duty to correct the said list by adding thereto the names of persons entitled to vote, and not already thereon, and by striking therefrom fictitious names or names of persons who have died or removed from said district; and the said lists shall be open for inspection by any qualified elector of the county or ward in which the election-district is situated, as well as by the person claiming to be registered, at any time before the day of election.

We set forth the election-law in full in order to show that the charge made by the majority of the committee, that the system of registration in Philadelphia is open to grave objections, is not founded in fact.

From the evidence it will appear that the majority of the committee called a large number of assessors as witnesses, and in every instance they were found to be gentlemen of character and ability, understanding fully the law, and that in all cases they endeavored to carry out the very letter of the law.

Each division is not to exceed two hundred and fifty voters; if they do the division has to be subdivided before the next election ensuing. These assessors, so called, swore that they visited each and every house, inquired for each and every person residing in those houses, within their particular divisions, and that they erased all persons who were found to have removed or to have died since the last registration was taken, and that they added to their lists according to law all voters who were found to be residents within their divisions, whose names were not previously on the lists; that they posted their lists upon the election-house door, as required by law, and were at their posts of duty upon the days named in the law; that no persons appeared either to challenge any name upon the lists or to make any complaints whatever in regard to the persons appearing as registered voters on the lists so posted upon the election-house door.

This certainly is a singular circumstance when it is understood that the evidence shows that the democratic executive committee were actively at work for the purpose of carrying the election in that city; that no complaint was made, but that they waited until the middle of October and then flooded the court with petitions containing names charged to be improperly on the lists. The minority are of the opinion that this delay was for a partisan purpose, namely, to create suspicion through the country that frauds were contemplated by the republicans, as great care was taken to publish the number of names contained in these petitions a few days prior to the election. The evidence shows that every care was taken to make the registered list as complete and correct as human skill, attention, and honesty could make it. There is no evidence which will warrant the majority in stating that the assessors were frequently men selected for the purpose of making excessive registrations rather than true and correct ones; for in no single instance was it found that the assessors had been remiss in their duty, nor is there any evidence tending to show any fraudulent intent on the part of a single assessor in the whole city, nor was the character of any assessor impeached or any attempt made to so impeach. The assessors are elected by the voters of each and every election-division. James Penn McCain, prothonotary of the court of common pleas for the county of Philadelphia, furnished a certified record, under the seal of the court, giving the total number of petitions filed, the total number of names ordered stricken off by the court, and the total number of names marked with a cross; which is as follows:

Democratic petitions acted on	395
Republican petitions acted on	78
Total	473
Number of names stricken off on democratic petitions	6,490
On republican petitions	1,539
Making a total of names stricken from registered lists of persons found to have died and removed from the division	8,029
The court marked with a red cross	3,606
Of these on democratic petitions	3,091
On republican petitions	515
Total number of petitions presented	571
Number disposed of	473
Leaving undisposed of	98

The court commenced its first session to act upon these petitions October 10, and held its final session November 4, 1876. The evidence shows that out of the ninety-eight petitions unacted on, nearly all, or quite all, were republican petitions. The reason of their not being acted upon was that the time of the court had been occupied by the democratic executive committee until there was no time left to finish the remaining petitions.

It will be seen by this statement that the majority of the committee have fallen into a very grave error in stating that some twelve thousand or thirteen thousand were marked with a red cross, and that some "eighty-two hundred and eighty-two were stricken off absolutely from the lists," when in fact and in truth the evidence shows that the total number of names absolutely stricken off and marked with a cross was 11,636. When it is understood that the registration is made in the first week in June, and that the revision of these lists took place between October 10 and November 4, of necessity a large number of persons must have died and removed during the four months intervening. The evidence shows that the court refused to strike off the thirty-six hundred and six names and simply marked them with a red cross, for the reason that there was no evidence tending to prove that these persons were not properly on the lists and entitled to vote in the divisions where they were registered. But because petitions had been filed charging that they were fraudulently upon the lists, the court deemed it its duty to so mark them, furnishing lists to authorized individuals of both parties, in order that a complete supervision could be had at the various polls on election-day by challenging persons who were so marked. Nowhere in the evidence taken in Philadelphia was there a single fraudulent vote proven as having been cast at the last election, with one exception, and we cite the evidence relative thereto:

By Mr. WELLS:

Question. Do you know of any fraudulent votes cast at the last election, or of any attempt made to cast such votes?

Answer. I know of but one attempt to vote fraudulently, and that was in the division in which I live.

Q. What division is that?

A. The second division of the thirty-first ward.

Q. What was the nature of that attempt?

A. A gentleman came to vote on a tax-receipt which was a fraudulent one, and acknowledged to be such; he was naturalized at this election, and held a tax-receipt for last year; he was prevented from voting.

Q. Do you know the politics of that individual?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was his politics?

A. He was going to vote the democratic ticket.

Q. By what means was he prevented?

A. By means of a challenge.

The census of 1876 of Philadelphia shows that of males over twenty-one years old there were 226,070; females, 246,634; males under twenty-one, 171,998; females, 172,476—giving a total population of 817,448. The vote in November, 1876, for electors was:

Hoffman, republican	77,088
Stief, democrat	62,138
Making a total of	139,226
The total registration of 1876	186,201
Total number stricken off was	8,282
Leaving a total of registered voters on the list entitled to vote	174,313
This will show an excess of registration over votes cast of	38,693
Taking from this all those marked with a red cross	3,606
And it will leave an excess of the number of votes cast	35,037
In 1875 Hartranft, republican, received	65,262
Pershing, democrat, received	47,800
Brown, temperance	647
Scattering	2
Showing a total of	113,891
The registration in 1875 was	175,072
From which there were stricken off	12,397
Which left a registration of	159,675
Deduct the number of actual votes cast from the number registered, and it will leave an excess of	45,794
Deduct the registered vote of 1875, 159,685, from the registered vote of 1876, 174,313, and we find an excess of registration in 1876 over registration in 1875 of	14,628
Deduct the vote of 1875, 113,891, from the vote of 1876, 139,226, and we find that the excess of 1876 over 1875 is	25,335

When it is remembered that 1876 was the centennial year, and that the Centennial Exposition took place in the city of Philadelphia, it will not be considered surprising that the registration increased 14,628, and especially when it is understood that the evidence shows that over five thousand new buildings were erected during the year, and ten thousand vacant buildings were occupied. The votes of the different presidential years in Philadelphia are as follows:

1860.
Lincoln	39,240
Breckenridge	30,882
Bell	7,134
Douglas	9,274
	86,530
1864.
Lincoln	55,798
McClellan	44,032
	99,830
1868.
Grant	60,987
Seymour	55,173
	116,160
1872.
Grant	68,878
Greeley	23,500
	93,378
1876.
Hayes	77,088
Tilden	62,138
	139,226

It will be seen by this statement that the increase between each presidential year is about the same. The ratio of registered voters to the population in Philadelphia averages about one to a fraction over five, while it will be discovered that at the election of 1876 the registered voters averaged one to four and six-tenths. The majority of the committee state in their report that the "fact of excessive registration in Philadelphia becomes more apparent when it is known that over twenty-thousand of the names registered were successfully attacked and the names stricken off or marked with a red cross." It is certainly strange that the majority of the committee could have been led into such a blunder as this statement. For if they had examined the evidence they would have found, as stated above, that only 11,636 names were successfully attacked, and 3,606 of this number were simply removals from one division to another between the time when they were registered and the time when the list was revised, a period of nearly four months.

Mr. Thomas Fahy, to whose evidence the majority of the committee refer, was certainly very unfortunate in his testimony, and no doubt the majority of the committee were misled by having omitted to examine other testimony. Fahy testified that he counted the names on certain petitions handed him in the democratic committee-room, and that the total number so counted amounted to 20,000, and that this aggregate was made up for the purpose of publishing in the partisan newspapers a few days before the election; that he did not know whether these names were contained in the petitions filed in the court or not; and in fact his whole testimony was simply that of an extreme partisan willing and ready to give such data and statement as would be essential in sustaining the charge against his opponents of fraud. He swore he was an active politician and an ardent partisan, and was employed by the democratic executive committee during the whole period between the registration and the election in looking after the interest of the democratic candidate; and yet he was unable to testify to a single instance of fraud or attempt at fraud coming under his own personal observation. In fact his evidence consists of suspicion, surmises, guesses, and "don't recollects."

The evidence further shows that besides the United States supervisors selected from each party there were also State supervisors selected from each party, and that the committees of each party selected a person known as a challenger, giving three persons to each poll from different parties to supervise the election and to challenge all fraudulent votes; and yet, after an investigation of days and the taking of a large amount of testimony not a single fraudulent vote was proven.

Nor was there any evidence elicited tending to prove any conspiracy or intent on the part of office-holders in the city of Philadelphia to perpetrate any fraud at the election; but, on the contrary, the evidence clearly establishes the fact that the party in power in that city used every effort and means at their command to prevent fraud and fraudulent votes. The mayor and chief of police and all the subordinate officers of the city labored arduously to secure to the citizens of Philadelphia a fair, free, and honest ballot, and through their efforts and the Federal officers and the United States supervisor of elections the same was secured. The minority of the committee feel it is due to the country to state that if the same diligence had been exercised by the city officials of the neighboring city of New York the amount of fraud would have been much lessened and the democratic vote much smaller at the last election in that city.

We would recommend to the city officials of New York the practice of the city officials of Philadelphia in trying to secure to all a fair ballot and an honest count. The evidence discloses that the same form of abuses appertaining to New York City were sought to be introduced in Philadelphia, but through the vigilance of the officials of Philadelphia the fraud attempted was prevented in its incipiency, as it appeared by the evidence that during the registration a member of the democratic executive committee was arrested, having in his possession a large quantity of water-lined paper, such as was used in printing tax-receipts, which were issued to the tax-payers of Philadelphia, and upon which they were entitled to vote.

The minority also express very great surprise at and call attention to the statement of the majority in their report as to the chief supervisor of elections of the city of Philadelphia, (a Federal officer,) whom they charge as having failed to do his duty. The majority say:

"Your committee would call particular attention to the fact that the chief supervisor of elections for the city of Philadelphia (a Federal officer) failed to do his duty, in this, that he did not instruct the supervisors under him to canvass and purge the registration-lists in order to find who were bona fide citizens and voters, as was done in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City. And further, that he instructed his supervisors that the pay would not be sufficient to compensate them for time spent in performing their duty. It seems to us that if proper effort had been made in that direction an amount of money sufficient to have compensated them for their duties could have been secured without difficulty. A large amount was devoted to that purpose in the city of New York. Why could it not have been secured for Philadelphia as well?"

The minority have only to say that this is an extreme partisan statement. The evidence shows that the chief supervisor took particular pains to see that a fair election was held, and to so supervise the registration and election as to prevent any frauds upon the ballot-boxes. He is regarded by the citizens of Philadelphia, irrespective of party, as a gentleman of culture, integrity, and ability. When the time arrives that in Philadelphia the politicians become so skillful in the art of fraudulent practices upon the ballot-boxes as is now and has been the case in the city of New York, the minority think the same system which is now used by Mr. Davenport in preventing attempted frauds in that city would of necessity have to be adopted to prevent like fraudulent practices in Philadelphia. The minority is of the opinion that the city of Philadelphia is to be congratulated, as well as the whole country, that the Federal Government is not put to an expense of from $60,000 to $70,000 in preparing books, hiring clerks, paying detectives, &c., as is the case in New York, for the purpose of securing a fair election to the people of the city of Philadelphia.

The majority of the committee also state that—

"It is established by the testimony that the office-holders and appointees, Federal, State, and municipal, in Philadelphia are from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand in number, and that they are almost entirely republicans, every one of whom, according to the testimony of Mr. Welsh, is appointed and holds his place for partisan purposes. In reaching a conclusion in reference to the management of political affairs in Philadelphia the committee have relied much on the testimony of this gentleman, a venerable and well-known citizen of that community and a republican. According to his testimony it has long been the custom in Philadelphia to swell the list of employés in the various departments of the city government enormously just previous to an election, and he unhesitatingly asserted that the increased number of employés was appointed not only that their own votes might be, as they were, controlled by those who gave them their places, but because they were supposed to control a certain additional number of votes. This gentleman has for some time been ardently enlisted in the cause of municipal reform in that city."

The minority have nothing to say in disparagement of Mr. Welsh as a gentleman, but it is certainly very remarkable that the majority of the committee have placed so much importance on the testimony of Mr. Welsh, who, it is true, testifies as if he was thoroughly disgusted with a republican form of government and tired of all kinds of government, unless it should be one under his own management, control, and supervision, and without interference on the behalf of any one; or in other words, he seemed to be of the opinion that a despotic form of government would be best for all people, providing he was the despot. His testimony will disclose the fact that he testified on his examination-in-chief to things of which he had no personal knowledge, and, on the cross-examination, after having a detailed account of the management of affairs in Philadelphia by the municipal authorities, was obliged to admit that he did not know the mayor's name of the city of Philadelphia, did not know how the work on the public streets was performed, whether by contract, or whether by immediate hiring, or by commissioners. He also stated that the police force was increased just prior to the election for political purposes. On cross-examination, he admitted that he did not know how many policemen were employed, never made any inquiry, did not know of his own personal knowledge that any additional were employed just prior to the election; while the chief of police testified that there were not as many policemen employed just prior to the election as there had been some two months previous, and the authorities having the supervision of the streets testified that there were not as many men employed on the streets during the two months immediately preceding the election as prior thereto by some five hundred; also, that all the work upon the streets is done by contract with the lowest bidders, all of whom are obliged to submit their bids in writing; that a large number of the contracts were held by prominent democrats, who employed the men who worked upon the streets without influence from any official of the city.

The minority are of the opinion that the majority of the committee are exceedingly unfortunate when they cite Mr. Welsh as their authority for making so remarkable a statement as is contained in their report; and it is only deemed necessary for the minority, in order that it may be fully understood what must be the condition of mind possessed by Mr. Welsh, to quote the following from him, which is also cited by the majority:

"Things have not yet got quite bad enough for me. I should like to have anarchy for a couple of months, and then we could have things right."

In conclusion, the minority report that in the election held in Philadelphia November 7, 1876, for Congressmen and presidential electors, and especially in the registration preceding it, there were no irregularities proven; and while there were attempts by members of the democratic party to perpetrate frauds, they were prevented through the vigilance of the party in power, and but for which the result would probably have been different.

The minority deem it due to themselves to say that this report has not been sooner prepared, and is now presented in this imperfect manner, for the reason that owing to the large accumulation of matter to be examined coming from various other investigating committees, it has been impossible to have the testimony taken by the committee printed. Besides, the majority of the committee have had in their possession and under their control the entire manuscript, and no meeting of the committee was called or report read at which the minority was present, until the day before the adjournment of Congress, when the majority submitted their report, and it was agreed that the minority should make their report and the same should be printed with the majority. For this reason the minority is unable to make as satisfactory and perfect a report as they would like to do. They have only to add that the entire investigation in Philadelphia proves the fact that, with a corps of officers determined to have a fair and honest election, it can always be accomplished even in large cities, and was accomplished in the city of Philadelphia at the election held on November 7, 1876, for the election of presidential electors and members of Congress.

Respectfully submitted.
